

'To me she seems overloaded,' observed Eugénie; 'she would look far better if she wore fewer, and we should then be able to see her finely formed throat and wrists.'

'See how the artist peeps out!' exclaimed Madame Danglars. 'My poor Eugénie, you must conceal your passion for the fine arts.'

'I admire all that is beautiful,' returned the young lady.

'What do you think of the count?' inquired Debray; 'he is not much amiss, according to my ideas of good looks.'

'The count,' repeated Eugénie, as though it had not occurred to her to observe him sooner; 'the count?—oh, he is so dreadfully pale.'

'I quite agree with you,' said Morcerf; 'and the secret of that very pallor is what we want to find out. The Countess G—— insists upon it that he is a vampire.'

'Then the Countess G—— has returned to Paris, has she?' inquired the baroness.

'Is that she, mamma?' asked Eugénie; 'almost opposite to us, with that profusion of beautiful light hair?'

'Yes,' said Madame Danglars; 'that is she. Shall I tell you what you ought to do, Morcerf?'

'Command me, madame.'

'Well, then, you should go and bring your Count of Monte Cristo to us.'

'What for?' asked Eugénie.

'What for? Why, to converse with him, of course. Have you really no desire to meet him?'

'None whatever,' replied Eugénie.

'Strange child,' murmured the baroness.

'He will very probably come of his own accord,' said Morcerf. 'There; do you see, madame, he recognizes you, and bows.'

The baroness returned the salute in the most smiling and graceful manner.

'Well,' said Morcerf; 'I may as well be magnanimous, and tear myself away to forward your wishes. Adieu; I will go and try if there are any means of speaking to him.'

'Go straight to his box; that will be the simplest plan.'

'But I have never been presented.'

'Presented to whom?'

'To the beautiful Greek.'

'You say she is only a slave?'

'While you assert that she is a queen, or at least a princess. No; I hope that when he sees me leave you, he will come out.'

'That is possible—go.'

'I am going,' said Albert, as he made his parting bow.

Just as he was passing the count's box, the door opened, and Monte Cristo came forth. After giving some directions to Ali, who stood in the lobby, the count took Albert's arm. Carefully closing the box door, Ali placed himself before it, while a crowd of spectators assembled round the Nubian.

'Upon my word,' said Monte Cristo, 'Paris is a strange city, and the Parisians a very singular people. See that cluster of persons collected around poor Ali, who is as much astonished as themselves; really one might suppose he was the only Nubian they had ever beheld. Now I can promise you, that a Frenchman might show himself in public, either in Tunis, Constantinople, Bagdad, or Cairo, without being treated in that way.'

'That shows that the Eastern nations have too much good sense to waste their time and attention on objects undeserving of either. However, as far as Ali is concerned, I can assure you, the interest he excites is merely from the circumstance of his being your attendant—you, who are at this moment the most celebrated and fashionable person in Paris.'

'Really? and what has procured me so flattering a distinction?'

'What? why, yourself, to be sure! You give away horses worth a thousand louis; you save the lives of ladies of high rank and beauty; under the name of Major Black you run thoroughbreds ridden by tiny urchins not larger than marmots; then, when you have carried off the golden trophy of victory, instead of setting any value on it, you give it to the first handsome woman you think of!'

'And who has filled your head with all this nonsense?'

'Why, in the first place, I heard it from Madame Danglars, who, by the by, is dying to see you in her box, or to have you seen there by others; secondly, I learned it from Beauchamp's journal; and thirdly, from my own imagination. Why, if you sought concealment, did you call your horse Vampa?'

‘That was an oversight, certainly,’ replied the count; ‘but tell me, does the Count of Morcerf never visit the Opera? I have been looking for him, but without success.’

‘He will be here tonight.’

‘In what part of the house?’

‘In the baroness’s box, I believe.’

‘That charming young woman with her is her daughter?’

‘Yes.’

‘I congratulate you.’

Morcerf smiled.

‘We will discuss that subject at length some future time,’ said he. ‘But what do you think of the music?’

‘What music?’

‘Why, the music you have been listening to.’

‘Oh, it is well enough as the production of a human composer, sung by featherless bipeds, to quote the late Diogenes.’

‘From which it would seem, my dear count, that you can at pleasure enjoy the seraphic strains that proceed from the seven choirs of paradise?’

‘You are right, in some degree; when I wish to listen to sounds more exquisitely attuned to melody than mortal ear ever yet listened to, I go to sleep.’

‘Then sleep here, my dear count. The conditions are favourable; what else was opera invented for?’

‘No, thank you. Your orchestra is too noisy. To sleep after the manner I speak of, absolute calm and silence are necessary, and then a certain preparation—’

‘I know—the famous hashish!’

‘Precisely. So, my dear viscount, whenever you wish to be regaled with music come and sup with me.’

‘I have already enjoyed that treat when breakfasting with you,’ said Morcerf.

‘Do you mean at Rome?’

‘I do.’

‘Ah, then, I suppose you heard Haydée’s guzla; the poor exile frequently beguiles a weary hour in playing over to me the airs of her native land.’

Morcerf did not pursue the subject, and Monte Cristo himself fell into a silent reverie.

‘I really never met with one woman so ready to do justice to the charms of another as yourself,’ responded Lucien, raising his lorgnette to his eye. ‘A most lovely creature, upon my soul!’ was his verdict.

‘Who is this young person, M. de Morcerf?’ inquired Eugénie; ‘does anybody know?’

‘Mademoiselle,’ said Albert, replying to this direct appeal, ‘I can give you very exact information on that subject, as well as on most points relative to the mysterious person of whom we are now conversing—the young woman is a Greek.’

‘So I should suppose by her dress; if you know no more than that, everyone here is as well-informed as yourself.’

‘I am extremely sorry you find me so ignorant a cicerone,’ replied Morcerf, ‘but I am reluctantly obliged to confess, I have nothing further to communicate—yes, stay, I do know one thing more, namely, that she is a musician, for one day when I chanced to be breakfasting with the count, I heard the sound of a guzla—it is impossible that it could have been touched by any other finger than her own.’

‘Then your count entertains visitors, does he?’ asked Madame Danglars.

‘Indeed he does, and in a most lavish manner, I can assure you.’

‘I must try and persuade M. Danglars to invite him to a ball or dinner, or something of the sort, that he may be compelled to ask us in return.’

‘What,’ said Debray, laughing; ‘do you really mean you would go to his house?’

‘Why not? my husband could accompany me.’

‘But do you know this mysterious count is a bachelor?’

‘You have ample proof to the contrary, if you look opposite,’ said the baroness, as she laughingly pointed to the beautiful Greek.

‘No, no!’ exclaimed Debray; ‘that girl is not his wife: he told us himself she was his slave. Do you not recollect, Morcerf, his telling us so at your breakfast?’

‘Well, then,’ said the baroness, ‘if slave she be, she has all the air and manner of a princess.’

‘Of the “Arabian Nights”.’

‘If you like; but tell me, my dear Lucien, what it is that constitutes a princess. Why, diamonds—and she is covered with them.’

Having bowed to the two ladies, he extended his hand to Debray. By the baroness he was most graciously welcomed, while Eugénie received him with her accustomed coldness.

‘My dear fellow,’ said Debray, ‘you have come in the nick of time. There is madame overwhelming me with questions respecting the count; she insists upon it that I can tell her his birth, education, and parentage, where he came from, and whither he is going. Being no disciple of Cagliostro, I was wholly unable to do this; so, by way of getting out of the scrape, I said, “Ask Morcerf; he has got the whole history of his beloved Monte Cristo at his finger’s ends,” whereupon the baroness signified her desire to see you.’

‘Is it not almost incredible,’ said Madame Danglars, ‘that a person having at least half a million of secret-service money at his command, should possess so little information?’

‘Let me assure you, madame,’ said Lucien, ‘that had I really the sum you mention at my disposal, I would employ it more profitably than in troubling myself to obtain particulars respecting the Count of Monte Cristo, whose only merit in my eyes consists in his being twice as rich as a nabob. However, I have turned the business over to Morcerf, so pray settle it with him as may be most agreeable to you; for my own part, I care nothing about the count or his mysterious doings.’

‘I am very sure no nabob would have sent me a pair of horses worth 32,000 francs, wearing on their heads four diamonds valued at 5,000 francs each.’

‘He seems to have a mania for diamonds,’ said Morcerf, smiling, ‘and I verily believe that, like Potemkin, he keeps his pockets filled, for the sake of strewing them along the road, as Tom Thumb did his flint stones.’

‘Perhaps he has discovered some mine,’ said Madame Danglars. ‘I suppose you know he has an order for unlimited credit on the baron’s banking establishment?’

‘I was not aware of it,’ replied Albert, ‘but I can readily believe it.’

‘And, further, that he stated to M. Danglars his intention of only staying a year in Paris, during which time he proposed to spend six millions.’

‘He must be the Shah of Persia, travelling incog.’

‘Have you noticed the remarkable beauty of the young woman, M. Lucien?’ inquired Eugénie.

The bell rang at this moment for the rising of the curtain.

‘You will excuse my leaving you,’ said the count, turning in the direction of his box.

‘What? Are you going?’

‘Pray, say everything that is kind to Countess G—— on the part of her friend the vampire.’

‘And what message shall I convey to the baroness?’

‘That, with her permission, I shall do myself the honour of paying my respects in the course of the evening.’

The third act had begun; and during its progress the Count of Morcerf, according to his promise, made his appearance in the box of Madame Danglars. The Count of Morcerf was not a person to excite either interest or curiosity in a place of public amusement; his presence, therefore, was wholly unnoticed, save by the occupants of the box in which he had just seated himself.

The quick eye of Monte Cristo however, marked his coming; and a slight though meaning smile passed over his lips. Haydée, whose soul seemed centred in the business of the stage, like all unsophisticated natures, delighted in whatever addressed itself to the eye or ear. The third act passed off as usual. Mesdemoiselles Noblet, Julia, and Leroux executed the customary pirouettes; Robert duly challenged the Prince of Granada; and the royal father of the princess Isabella, taking his daughter by the hand, swept round the stage with majestic strides, the better to display the rich folds of his velvet robe and mantle. After which the curtain again fell, and the spectators poured forth from the theatre into the lobbies and salon.

The count left his box, and a moment later was saluting the Baronne Danglars, who could not restrain a cry of mingled pleasure and surprise.

‘You are welcome, count!’ she exclaimed, as he entered. ‘I have been most anxious to see you, that I might repeat orally the thanks writing can so ill express.’

‘Surely so trifling a circumstance cannot deserve a place in your remembrance. Believe me, madame, I had entirely forgotten it.’

‘But it is not so easy to forget, monsieur, that the very next day after your princely gift you saved the life of my dear friend, Madame de Villefort, which was endangered by the very animals your generosity restored to me.’

'This time, at least, I do not deserve your thanks. It was Ali, my Nubian slave, who rendered this service to Madame de Villefort.'

'Was it Ali,' asked the Count of Morcerf, 'who rescued my son from the hands of bandits?'

'No, count,' replied Monte Cristo taking the hand held out to him by the general; 'in this instance I may fairly and freely accept your thanks; but you have already tendered them, and fully discharged your debt—if indeed there existed one—and I feel almost mortified to find you still reverting to the subject. May I beg of you, baroness, to honour me with an introduction to your daughter?'

'Oh, you are no stranger—at least not by name,' replied Madame Danglars, 'and the last two or three days we have really talked of nothing but you. Eugénie,' continued the baroness, turning towards her daughter, 'this is the Count of Monte Cristo.'

The count bowed, while Mademoiselle Danglars bent her head slightly.

'You have a charming young person with you tonight, count,' said Eugénie. 'Is she your daughter?'

'No, mademoiselle,' said Monte Cristo, astonished at the coolness and freedom of the question. 'She is a poor unfortunate Greek left under my care.'

'And what is her name?'

'Haydée,' replied Monte Cristo.

'A Greek?' murmured the Count of Morcerf.

'Yes, indeed, count,' said Madame Danglars; 'and tell me, did you ever see at the court of Ali Tepelini, whom you so gloriously and valiantly served, a more exquisite beauty or richer costume?'

'Did I hear rightly, monsieur,' said Monte Cristo 'that you served at Yanina?'

'I was inspector-general of the pasha's troops,' replied Morcerf; 'and it is no secret that I owe my fortune, such as it is, to the liberality of the illustrious Albanese chief.'

'But look!' exclaimed Madame Danglars.

'Where?' stammered Morcerf.

'There,' said Monte Cristo placing his arms around the count, and leaning with him over the front of the box, just as Haydée, whose eyes were occupied in examining the theatre in search of her guardian, perceived his pale features close to Morcerf's face. It was as if the young girl beheld the head of Medusa.

'Do no such thing, I beg of you; he would only send you another, formed of a magnificent sapphire, or hollowed out of a gigantic ruby. It is his way, and you must take him as you find him.'

At this moment the bell rang to announce the drawing up of the curtain for the second act. Albert rose to return to his place.

'Shall I see you again?' asked the countess.

'At the end of the next act, with your permission, I will come and inquire whether there is anything I can do for you in Paris?'

'Pray take notice,' said the countess, 'that my present residence is 22 Rue de Rivoli, and that I am at home to my friends every Saturday evening. So now, you are both forewarned.'

The young men bowed, and quitted the box. Upon reaching their stalls, they found the whole of the audience in the parterre standing up and directing their gaze towards the box formerly possessed by the Russian ambassador. A man of from thirty-five to forty years of age, dressed in deep black, had just entered, accompanied by a young woman dressed after the Eastern style. The lady was surpassingly beautiful, while the rich magnificence of her attire drew all eyes upon her.

'Hullo,' said Albert; 'it is Monte Cristo and his Greek!'

The strangers were, indeed, no other than the count and Haydée. In a few moments the young girl had attracted the attention of the whole house, and even the occupants of the boxes leaned forward to scrutinize her magnificent diamonds.

The second act passed away during one continued buzz of voices—one deep whisper—intimating that some great and universally interesting event had occurred; all eyes, all thoughts, were occupied with the young and beautiful woman, whose gorgeous apparel and splendid jewels made a most extraordinary spectacle.

Upon this occasion an unmistakable sign from Madame Danglars intimated her desire to see Albert in her box directly the curtain fell on the second act, and neither the politeness nor good taste of Morcerf would permit his neglecting an invitation so unequivocally given. At the close of the act he therefore went to the baroness.

‘Yes.’

‘And what effect does he produce?’

‘Why,’ said Albert, ‘he was talked about for a week; then the coronation of the queen of England took place, followed by the theft of Mademoiselle Mars’s diamonds; and so people talked of something else.’

‘My good fellow,’ said Château-Renaud, ‘the count is your friend and you treat him accordingly. Do not believe what Albert is telling you, countess; so far from the sensation excited in the Parisian circles by the appearance of the Count of Monte Cristo having abated, I take upon myself to declare that it is as strong as ever. His first astounding act upon coming amongst us was to present a pair of horses, worth 32,000 francs, to Madame Danglars; his second, the almost miraculous preservation of Madame de Villefort’s life; now it seems that he has carried off the prize awarded by the Jockey Club. I therefore maintain, in spite of Morectf, that not only is the count the object of interest at this present moment, but also that he will continue to be so for a month longer if he pleases to exhibit an eccentricity of conduct which, after all, may be his ordinary mode of existence.’

‘Perhaps you are right,’ said Morectf; ‘meanwhile, who is in the Russian ambassador’s box?’

‘Which box do you mean?’ asked the countess.

‘The one between the pillars on the first tier—it seems to have been fitted up entirely afresh.’

‘Did you observe anyone during the first act?’ asked Château-Renaud.

‘Where?’

‘In that box.’

‘No,’ replied the countess, ‘it was certainly empty during the first act; then, resuming the subject of their previous conversation, she said, ‘And so you really believe it was your mysterious Count of Monte Cristo that gained the prize?’

‘I am sure of it.’

‘And who afterwards sent the cup to me?’

‘Undoubtedly.’

‘But I don’t know him,’ said the countess; ‘I have a great mind to return it.’

She bent forwards as though to assure herself of the reality of what she saw, then, uttering a faint cry, threw herself back in her seat. The sound was heard by the people about Ali, who instantly opened the box-door.

‘Why, count,’ exclaimed Eugénie, ‘what has happened to your ward? she seems to have been taken suddenly ill.’

‘Very probably,’ answered the count. ‘But do not be alarmed on her account. Haydée’s nervous system is delicately organized, and she is peculiarly susceptible to the odours even of flowers—nay, there are some which cause her to faint if brought into her presence. However,’ continued Monte Cristo, drawing a small phial from his pocket, ‘I have an infallible remedy.’

So saying, he bowed to the baroness and her daughter, exchanged a parting shake of the hand with Debray and the count, and left Madame Danglars’ box. Upon his return to Haydée he found her still very pale. As soon as she saw him she seized his hand; her own hands were moist and icy cold.

‘Who was it you were talking with over there?’ she asked.

‘With the Count of Morectf,’ answered Monte Cristo. ‘He tells me he served your illustrious father, and that he owes his fortune to him.’

‘Wretch!’ exclaimed Haydée, her eyes flashing with rage; ‘he sold my father to the Turks, and the fortune he boasts of was the price of his treachery! Did not you know that, my dear lord?’

‘Something of this I heard in Epirus,’ said Monte Cristo; ‘but the particulars are still unknown to me. You shall relate them to me, my child. They are, no doubt, both curious and interesting.’

‘Yes, yes; but let us go. I feel as though it would kill me to remain long near that dreadful man.’

So saying, Haydée arose, and wrapping herself in her burnouse of white cashmere embroidered with pearls and coral, she hastily quitted the box at the moment when the curtain was rising upon the fourth act.

‘Do you observe,’ said the Countess G—— to Albert, who had returned to her side, ‘that man does nothing like other people; he listens most devoutly to the third act of Robert le Diable, and when the fourth begins, takes his departure.’

the cup was a small piece of paper, on which were written these words—"From Lord Ruthven to Countess G——."

'Precisely; I was sure of it,' said Morcretf.

'Sure of what?'

'That the owner of the horse was Lord Ruthven himself.'

'What Lord Ruthven do you mean?'

'Why, our Lord Ruthven—the Vampire of the Salle Argentina!'

'Is it possible?' exclaimed the countess; 'is he here in Paris?'

'To be sure,—why not?'

'And you visit him?—meet him at your own house and elsewhere?'

'I assure you he is my most intimate friend, and M. de Château-Renaud has also the honour of his acquaintance.'

'But why are you so sure of his being the winner of the Jockey Club prize?'

'Was not the winning horse entered by the name of Vampa?'

'What of that?'

'Why, do you not recollect the name of the celebrated bandit by whom I was made prisoner?'

'Oh, yes.'

'And from whose hands the count extricated me in so wonderful a manner?'

'To be sure, I remember it all now.'

'He called himself Vampa. You see, it's evident where the count got the name.'

'But what could have been his motive for sending the cup to me?'

'In the first place, because I had spoken much of you to him, as you may believe; and in the second, because he delighted to see a countrywoman take so lively an interest in his success.'

'I trust and hope you never repeated to the count all the foolish remarks we used to make about him?'

'I should not like to affirm upon oath that I have not. Besides, his presenting you the cup under the name of Lord Ruthven—'

'Oh, but that is dreadful! Why, the man must owe me a fearful grudge.'

'Does his action appear like that of an enemy?'

'No; certainly not.'

'Well, then—'

'And so he is in Paris?'

ted the attention of her mother to an opposite box on the first circle, in which sat the Countess G——, and where Morcerf had just made his appearance. ‘So we meet again, my travelling friend, do we?’ cried the countess, extending her hand to him with all the warmth and cordiality of an old acquaintance; ‘it was really very good of you to recognize me so quickly, and still more so to bestow your first visit on me.’

‘Be assured,’ replied Albert, ‘that if I had been aware of your arrival in Paris, and had known your address, I should have paid my respects to you before this. Allow me to introduce my friend, Baron de Château-Renaud, one of the few true gentlemen now to be found in France, and from whom I have just learned that you were a spectator of the races in the Champ-de-Mars, yesterday.’ Château-Renaud bowed to the countess.

‘So you were at the races, baron?’ inquired the countess eagerly.

‘Yes, madame.’

‘Well, then,’ pursued Madame G—— with considerable animation, ‘you can probably tell me who won the Jockey Club stakes?’

‘I am sorry to say I cannot,’ replied the baron; ‘and I was just asking the same question of Albert.’

‘Are you very anxious to know, countess?’ asked Albert.

‘To know what?’

‘The name of the owner of the winning horse?’

‘Excessively; only imagine—but do tell me, viscount, whether you really are acquainted with it or no?’

‘I beg your pardon, madame, but you were about to relate some story, were you not? You said, “only imagine,”—and then paused. Pray continue.’

‘Well, then, listen. You must know I felt so interested in the splendid roan horse, with his elegant little rider, so tastefully dressed in a pink satin jacket and cap, that I could not help praying for their success with as much earnestness as though the half of my fortune were at stake; and when I saw them outstrip all the others, and come to the winning-post in such gallant style, I actually clapped my hands with joy. Imagine my surprise, when, upon returning home, the first object I met on the staircase was the identical jockey in the pink jacket! I concluded that, by some singular chance, the owner of the winning horse must live in the same hotel as myself; but, as I entered my apartments, I beheld the very gold cup awarded as a prize to the unknown horse and rider. Inside

Chapter LIV

A Flurry in Stocks

OME days after this meeting, Albert de Morcerf visited the Count of Monte Cristo at his house in the Champs-Élysées, which had already assumed that palace-like appearance which the count’s princely fortune enabled him to give even to his most temporary residences. He came to renew the thanks of Madame Danglars which had been already conveyed to the count through the medium of a letter, signed ‘Baronne Danglars, née Hermine de Servieux.’

Albert was accompanied by Lucien Debray, who, joining in his friend’s conversation, added some passing compliments, the source of which the count’s talent for finesse easily enabled him to guess. He was convinced that Lucien’s visit was due to a double feeling of curiosity, the larger half of which sentiment emanated from the Rue de la Chaussée d’Antin. In short, Madame Danglars, not being able personally to examine in detail the domestic economy and household arrangements of a man who gave away horses worth 30,000 francs and who went to the opera with a Greek slave wearing diamonds to the amount of a million of money, had deputed those eyes, by which she was accustomed to see, to give her a faithful account of the mode of life of this incomprehensible person. But the count did not appear to suspect that there could be the slightest connection between Lucien’s visit and the curiosity of the barones.

‘You are in constant communication with the Baron Danglars?’ the count inquired of Albert de Morcerf.

‘Yes, count, you know what I told you?’

‘All remains the same, then, in that quarter?’

'It is more than ever a settled thing,' said Lucien,—and, considering that this remark was all that he was at that time called upon to make, he adjusted the glass to his eye, and biting the top of his gold headed cane, began to make the tour of the apartment, examining the arms and the pictures.

'Ah,' said Monte Cristo 'I did not expect that the affair would be so promptly concluded.'

'Oh, things take their course without our assistance. While we are forgetting them, they are falling into their appointed order; and when, again, our attention is directed to them, we are surprised at the progress they have made towards the proposed end. My father and M. Danglars served together in Spain, my father in the army and M. Danglars in the commissariat department. It was there that my father, ruined by the revolution, and M. Danglars, who never had possessed any patrimony, both laid the foundations of their different fortunes.'

'Yes,' said Monte Cristo 'I think M. Danglars mentioned that in a visit which I paid him; and,' continued he, casting a side-glance at Lucien, who was turning over the leaves of an album, 'Mademoiselle Eugénie is pretty—I think I remember that to be her name.'

'Very pretty, or rather, very beautiful,' replied Albert, 'but of that style of beauty which I do not appreciate; I am an ungrateful fellow.'

'You speak as if you were already her husband.'

'Ah,' returned Albert, in his turn looking around to see what Lucien was doing.

'Really,' said Monte Cristo, lowering his voice, 'you do not appear to me to be very enthusiastic on the subject of this marriage.'

'Mademoiselle Danglars is too rich for me,' replied Morcerf, 'and that frightens me.'

'Bah,' exclaimed Monte Cristo, 'that's a fine reason to give. Are you not rich yourself?'

'My father's income is about 50,000 francs per annum; and he will give me, perhaps, ten or twelve thousand when I marry.'

'That, perhaps, might not be considered a large sum, in Paris especially,' said the count; 'but everything does not depend on wealth, and it is a fine thing to have a good name, and to occupy a high station in society. Your name is celebrated, your position magnificent; and then the Comte de Morcerf is a much larger dimensions than these freaks of nature generally are, placed just at the corner of her mouth; and the effect tended to increase the expression of self-dependence that characterized her countenance.

The rest of Mademoiselle Eugénie's person was in perfect keeping with the head just described; she, indeed, reminded one of Diana, as Château-Renaud observed, but her bearing was more haughty and resolute.

As regarded her attainments, the only fault to be found with them was the same that a fastidious connoisseur might have found with her beauty, that they were somewhat too erudite and masculine for so young a person. She was a perfect linguist, a first-rate artist, wrote poetry, and composed music; to the study of the latter she professed to be entirely devoted, following it with an indefatigable perseverance, assisted by a schoolfellow,—a young woman without fortune whose talent promised to develop into remarkable powers as a singer. It was rumoured that she was an object of almost paternal interest to one of the principal composers of the day, who excited her to spare no pains in the cultivation of her voice, which might hereafter prove a source of wealth and independence. But this counsel effectually decided Mademoiselle Danglars never to commit herself by being seen in public with one destined for a theatrical life; and acting upon this principle, the banker's daughter, though perfectly willing to allow Mademoiselle Louise d'Armilly (that was the name of the young virtuosa) to practice with her through the day, took especial care not to be seen in her company. Still, though not actually received at the Hôtel Danglars in the light of an acknowledged friend, Louise was treated with far more kindness and consideration than is usually bestowed on a governess.

The curtain fell almost immediately after the entrance of Madame Danglars into her box, the band quitted the orchestra for the accustomed half-hour's interval allowed between the acts, and the audience were left at liberty to promenade the salon or lobbies, or to pay and receive visits in their respective boxes.

Morcerf and Château-Renaud were amongst the first to avail themselves of this permission. For an instant the idea struck Madame Danglars that this eagerness on the part of the young viscount arose from his impatience to join her party, and she whispered her expectations to her daughter, that Albert was hurrying to pay his respects to them. Mademoiselle Eugénie, however, merely returned a dissenting movement of the head, while, with a cold smile, she direc-