

The others, attracted by curiosity, were already scattered in different parts of the house; for they thought the visit would not be limited to the one room, and that, at the same time, they would obtain a view of the rest of the building, of which Monte Cristo had created a palace. Each one went out by the open doors. Monte Cristo waited for the two who remained; then, when they had passed, he brought up the rear, and on his face was a smile, which, if they could have understood it, would have alarmed them much more than a visit to the room they were about to enter. They began by walking through the apartments, many of which were fitted up in the Eastern style, with cushions and divans instead of beds, and pipes instead of furniture. The drawing-rooms were decorated with the rarest pictures by the old masters, the boudoirs hung with draperies from China, of fanciful colours, fantastic design, and wonderful texture. At length they arrived at the famous room. There was nothing particular about it, excepting that, although daylight had disappeared, it was not lighted, and everything in it was old-fashioned, while the rest of the rooms had been redecorated. These two causes were enough to give it a gloomy aspect.

‘Oh,’ cried Madame de Villefort, ‘it is really frightful!’

Madame Danglars tried to utter a few words, but was not heard. Many observations were made, the import of which was a unanimous opinion that there was something sinister about the room. ‘Is it not so?’ asked Monte Cristo. ‘Look at that large clumsy bed, hung with such gloomy, blood-coloured drapery! And those two crayon portraits, that have faded from the dampness; do they not seem to say, with their pale lips and staring eyes, “We have seen”?’

Villefort became livid; Madame Danglars fell into a long seat placed near the chimney.

‘Oh,’ said Madame de Villefort, smiling, ‘are you courageous enough to sit down upon the very seat perhaps upon which the crime was committed?’

Madame Danglars rose suddenly.

‘And then,’ said Monte Cristo, ‘this is not all!’

‘What is there more?’ said Debray, who had not failed to notice the agitation of Madame Danglars.

‘Ah, what else is there?’ said Danglars, ‘for, at present, I cannot say that I have seen anything extraordinary. What do you say, M. Cavalcanti?’

‘Ah,’ said he, ‘we have at Pisa, Ugolino’s tower; at Ferrara, Tasso’s prison; at Rimini, the room of Francesca and Paolo.’

‘Yes, but you have not this little staircase,’ said Monte Cristo, opening a door concealed by the drapery. ‘Look at it, and tell me what you think of it.’

‘What a wicked-looking, crooked staircase,’ said Château-Renaud with a smile.

‘I do not know whether the wine of Chios produces melancholy, but certainly everything appears to me black in this house,’ said Debray.

Ever since Valentine’s dowry had been mentioned, Morrel had been silent and sad.

‘Can you imagine,’ said Monte Cristo, ‘some Othello or Abbé de Ganges, one stormy, dark night, descending these stairs step by step, carrying a load, which he wishes to hide from the sight of man, if not from God?’

Madame Danglars half fainted on the arm of Villefort, who was obliged to support himself against the wall.

‘Ah, madame,’ cried Debray, ‘what is the matter with you? how pale you look!’

‘It is very evident what is the matter with her,’ said Madame de Villefort; ‘M. de Monte Cristo is relating horrible stories to us, doubtless intending to frighten us to death.’

‘Yes,’ said Villefort, ‘really, count, you frighten the ladies.’

‘What is the matter?’ asked Debray, in a whisper, of Madame Danglars.

‘Nothing,’ she replied with a violent effort. ‘I want air, that is all.’

‘Will you come into the garden?’ said Debray, advancing towards the back staircase.

‘No, no,’ she answered, ‘I would rather remain here.’

‘Are you really frightened, madame?’ said Monte Cristo.

‘Oh, no, sir,’ said Madame Danglars, ‘but you suppose scenes in a manner which gives them the appearance of reality.’

‘Ah, yes,’ said Monte Cristo smiling; ‘it is all a matter of imagination. Why should we not imagine this the apartment of an honest mother? And this bed with red hangings, a bed visited by the goddess Lucina? And that mysterious staircase, the passage through which, not to disturb their sleep, the doctor and nurse pass, or even the father carrying the sleeping child?’

Here Madame Danglars, instead of being calmed by the soft picture, uttered a groan and fainted.

'Madame Danglars is ill,' said Villefort; 'it would be better to take her to her carriage.'

'Oh, mon Dieu!' said Monte Cristo, 'and I have forgotten my smelling-bottle!'

'I have mine,' said Madame de Villefort; and she passed over to Monte Cristo a bottle full of the same kind of red liquid whose good properties the count had tested on Edward.

'Ah,' said Monte Cristo, taking it from her hand.

'Yes,' she said, 'at your advice I have made the trial.'

'And have you succeeded?'

'I think so.'

Madame Danglars was carried into the adjoining room; Monte Cristo dropped a very small portion of the red liquid upon her lips; she returned to consciousness.

'Ah,' she cried, 'what a frightful dream!'

Villefort pressed her hand to let her know it was not a dream. They looked for M. Danglars, but, as he was not especially interested in poetical ideas, he had gone into the garden, and was talking with Major Cavalcanti on the projected railway from Leghorn to Florence. Monte Cristo seemed in despair. He took the arm of Madame Danglars, and conducted her into the garden, where they found Danglars taking coffee between the Cavalcanti.

'Really, madame,' he said, 'did I alarm you much?'

'Oh, no, sir,' she answered; 'but you know, things impress us differently, according to the mood of our minds.' Villefort forced a laugh.

'And then, you know,' he said, 'an idea, a supposition, is sufficient.'

'Well,' said Monte Cristo, 'you may believe me if you like, but it is my opinion that a crime has been committed in this house.'

'Take care,' said Madame de Villefort, 'the king's attorney is here.'

'Ah,' replied Monte Cristo, 'since that is the case, I will take advantage of his presence to make my declaration.'

'Your declaration?' said Villefort.

'Yes, before witnesses.'

Villefort, who had hitherto not tasted the three or four glasses of rare wine which were placed before him, here took one, and drank it off. Monte Cristo allowed a short time to elapse, and then said:

'It is singular, baron, but the same idea came across me the first time I came here; it looked so gloomy I should never have bought it if my steward had not taken the matter into his own hands. Perhaps the fellow had been bribed by the notary.'

'It is probable,' stammered out Villefort, trying to smile; 'but I can assure you that I had nothing to do with any such proceeding. This house is part of Valentine's marriage-portion, and M. de Saint-Méran wished to sell it; for if it had remained another year or two uninhabited it would have fallen to ruin.' It was Morrel's turn to become pale.

'There was, above all, one room,' continued Monte Cristo, 'very plain in appearance, hung with red damask, which, I know not why, appeared to me quite dramatic.'

'Why so?' said Danglars; 'why dramatic?'

'Can we account for instinct?' said Monte Cristo. 'Are there not some places where we seem to breathe sadness?—why, we cannot tell. It is a chain of recollections—an idea which carries you back to other times, to other places—which, very likely, have no connection with the present time and place. And there is something in this room which reminds me forcibly of the chamber of the Marquise de Ganges¹ or Desdemona. Stay, since we have finished dinner, I will show it to you, and then we will take coffee in the garden. After dinner, the play.'

Monte Cristo looked inquiringly at his guests. Madame de Villefort rose, Monte Cristo did the same, and the rest followed their example. Villefort and Madame Danglars remained for a moment, as if rooted to their seats; they questioned each other with vague and stupid glances.

'Did you hear?' said Madame Danglars.

'We must go,' replied Villefort, offering his arm.

¹ Elisabeth de Rossan, Marquise de Ganges, was one of the famous women of the court of Louis XIV. where she was known as 'La Belle Provençale.' She was the widow of the Marquis de Castellane when she married de Ganges, and having the misfortune to excite the enmity of her new brothers-in-law, was forced by them to take poison; and they finished her off with pistol and dagger.—Ed.

'True,' said Monte Cristo; 'but what would be the use of living eighteen hundred years after Lucullus, if we can do no better than he could?'

The two Cavalcanti opened their enormous eyes, but had the good sense not to say anything.

'All this is very extraordinary,' said Château-Renaud; 'still, what I admire the most, I confess, is the marvellous promptitude with which your orders are executed. Is it not true that you only bought this house five or six days ago?'

'Certainly not longer.'

'Well, I am sure it is quite transformed since last week. If I remember rightly, it had another entrance, and the courtyard was paved and empty; while today we have a splendid lawn, bordered by trees which appear to be a hundred years old.'

'Why not? I am fond of grass and shade,' said Monte Cristo.

'Yes,' said Madame de Villefort, 'the door was towards the road before, and on the day of my miraculous escape you brought me into the house from the road, I remember.'

'Yes, madame,' said Monte Cristo; 'but I preferred having an entrance which would allow me to see the Bois de Boulogne over my gate.'

'In four days,' said Morrel; 'it is extraordinary!'

'Indeed,' said Château-Renaud, 'it seems quite miraculous to make a new house out of an old one; for it was very old, and dull too. I recollect coming for my mother to look at it when M. de Saint-Méran advertised it for sale two or three years ago.'

'M. de Saint-Méran?' said Madame de Villefort; 'then this house belonged to M. de Saint-Méran before you bought it?'

'It appears so,' replied Monte Cristo.

'Is it possible that you do not know of whom you purchased it?'

'Quite so; my steward transacts all this business for me.'

'It is certainly ten years since the house had been occupied,' said Château-Renaud, 'and it was quite melancholy to look at it, with the blinds closed, the doors locked, and the weeds in the court. Really, if the house had not belonged to the father-in-law of the procureur, one might have thought it some accursed place where a horrible crime had been committed.'

'Oh, this is very interesting,' said Debray; 'if there really has been a crime, we will investigate it.'

'There has been a crime,' said Monte Cristo. 'Come this way, gentlemen; come, M. Villefort, for a declaration to be available, should be made before the competent authorities.'

He then took Villefort's arm, and, at the same time, holding that of Madame Danglars under his own, he dragged the procureur to the plane-tree, where the shade was thickest. All the other guests followed.

'Stay,' said Monte Cristo, 'here, in this very spot' (and he stamped upon the ground), 'I had the earth dug up and fresh mould put in, to refresh these old trees; well, my man, digging, found a box, or rather, the iron-work of a box, in the midst of which was the skeleton of a newly born infant.' Monte Cristo felt the arm of Madame Danglars stiffen, while that of Villefort trembled.

'A newly born infant,' repeated Debray; 'this affair becomes serious!'

'Well,' said Château-Renaud, 'I was not wrong just now then, when I said that houses had souls and faces like men, and that their exteriors carried the impress of their characters. This house was gloomy because it was remorseful; it was remorseful because it concealed a crime.'

'Who said it was a crime?' asked Villefort, with a last effort.

'How? is it not a crime to bury a living child in a garden?' cried Monte Cristo. 'And pray what do you call such an action?'

'But who said it was buried alive?'

'Why bury it there if it were dead? This garden has never been a cemetery.'

'What is done to infanticides in this country?' asked Major Cavalcanti innocently.

'Oh, their heads are soon cut off,' said Danglars.

'Ah, indeed?' said Cavalcanti.

'I think so; am I not right, M. de Villefort?' asked Monte Cristo.

'Yes, count,' replied Villefort, in a voice now scarcely human.

Monte Cristo, seeing that the two persons for whom he had prepared this scene could scarcely endure it, and not wishing to carry it too far, said:

'Come, gentlemen,—some coffee, we seem to have forgotten it,' and he conducted the guests back to the table on the lawn.

‘Indeed, count,’ said Madame Danglars, ‘I am ashamed to own it, but all your frightful stories have so upset me, that I must beg you to let me sit down,’ and she fell into a chair.

Monte Cristo bowed, and went to Madame de Villefort.

‘I think Madame Danglars again requires your bottle,’ he said. But before Madame de Villefort could reach her friend, the procureur had found time to whisper to Madame Danglars, ‘I must speak to you.’

‘When?’

‘Tomorrow.’

‘Where?’

‘In my office, or in the court, if you like,—that is the surest place.’

‘I will be there.’

At this moment Madame de Villefort approached.

‘Thanks, my dear friend,’ said Madame Danglars, trying to smile; ‘it is over now, and I am much better.’

‘And,’ said Cavalcanti, ‘I know that Lake Fusaro alone supplies lampreys of that size.’

‘Exactly; one comes from the Volga, and the other from Lake Fusaro.’

‘Impossible!’ cried all the guests simultaneously.

‘Well, this is just what amuses me,’ said Monte Cristo. ‘I am like Nero—capitur impossibilia; and that is what is amusing you at this moment. This fish, which seems so exquisite to you, is very likely no better than perch or salmon; but it seemed impossible to procure it, and here it is.’

‘But how could you have these fish brought to France?’

‘Oh, nothing more easy. Each fish was brought over in a cask—one filled with river herbs and weeds, the other with rushes and lake plants; they were placed in a wagon built on purpose, and thus the sterlet lived twelve days, the lamprey eight, and both were alive when my cook seized them, killing one with milk and the other with wine. You do not believe me, M. Danglars!’

‘I cannot help doubting,’ answered Danglars with his stupid smile.

‘Baptistin,’ said the count, ‘have the other fish brought in—the sterlet and the lamprey which came in the other casks, and which are yet alive.’

Danglars opened his bewildered eyes; the company clapped their hands. Four servants carried in two casks covered with aquatic plants, and in each of which was breathing a fish similar to those on the table.

‘But why have two of each sort?’ asked Danglars.

‘Merely because one might have died,’ carelessly answered Monte Cristo.

‘You are certainly an extraordinary man,’ said Danglars; ‘and philosophers may well say it is a fine thing to be rich.’

‘And to have ideas,’ added Madame Danglars.

‘Oh, do not give me credit for this, madame; it was done by the Romans, who much esteemed them, and Pliny relates that they sent slaves from Ostia to Rome, who carried on their heads fish which he calls the mulus, and which, from the description, must probably be the goldfish. It was also considered a luxury to have them alive, it being an amusing sight to see them die, for, when dying, they change colour three or four times, and like the rainbow when it disappears, pass through all the prismatic shades, after which they were sent to the kitchen. Their agony formed part of their merit—if they were not seen alive, they were despised when dead.’

‘Yes,’ said Debray, ‘but then Ostia is only a few leagues from Rome.’

that the four quarters of the globe could provide was heaped in vases from China and jars from Japan. Rare birds, retaining their most brilliant plumage, enormous fish, spread upon massive silver dishes, together with every wine produced in the Archipelago, Asia Minor, or the Cape, sparkling in bottles, whose grotesque shape seemed to give an additional flavour to the draught, — all these, like one of the displays with which Apicius of old gratified his guests, passed in review before the eyes of the astonished Parisians, who understood that it was possible to expend a thousand louis upon a dinner for ten persons, but only on the condition of eating pearls, like Cleopatra, or drinking refined gold, like Lorenzo de' Medici.

Monte Cristo noticed the general astonishment, and began laughing and joking about it.

'Gentlemen,' he said, 'you will admit that, when arrived at a certain degree of fortune, the superfluities of life are all that can be desired; and the ladies will allow that, after having risen to a certain eminence of position, the ideal alone can be more exalted. Now, to follow out this reasoning, what is the marvellous?—that which we do not understand. What is it that we really desire?—that which we cannot obtain. Now, to see things which I cannot understand, to procure impossibilities, these are the study of my life. I gratify my wishes by two means—my will and my money. I take as much interest in the pursuit of some whim as you do, M. Danglars, in promoting a new railway line; you, M. de Villefort, in condemning a culprit to death; you, M. Debray, in pacifying a kingdom; you, M. de Châteaurenault, in pleasing a woman; and you, Morrel, in breaking a horse that no one can ride. For example, you see these two fish; one brought from fifty leagues beyond St. Petersburg, the other five leagues from Naples. Is it not amusing to see them both on the same table?'

'What are the two fish?' asked Danglars.

'M. Châteaurenault, who has lived in Russia, will tell you the name of one, and Major Cavalcanti, who is an Italian, will tell you the name of the other.'

'This one is, I think, a sterlet,' said Châteaurenault.

'And that one, if I mistake not, a lamprey.'

'Just so. Now, M. Danglars, ask these gentlemen where they are caught.'

'Sterlets,' said Châteaurenault, 'are only found in the Volga.'

Chapter LXIV

The Beggar

HE evening passed on; Madame de Villefort expressed a desire to return to Paris, which Madame Danglars had not dared to do, notwithstanding the uneasiness she experienced. On his wife's request, M. de Villefort was the first to give the signal of departure.

He offered a seat in his landau to Madame Danglars, that she might be under the care of his wife. As for M. Danglars, absorbed in an interesting conversation with M. Cavalcanti, he paid no attention to anything that was passing. While Monte Cristo had begged the smelling-bottle of Madame de Villefort, he had noticed the approach of Villefort to Madame Danglars, and he soon guessed all that had passed between them, though the words had been uttered in so low a voice as hardly to be heard by Madame Danglars. Without opposing their arrangements, he allowed Morrel, Châteaurenault, and Debray to leave on horseback, and the ladies in M. de Villefort's carriage. Danglars, more and more delighted with Major Cavalcanti, had offered him a seat in his carriage. Andrea Cavalcanti found his tilbury waiting at the door; the groom, in every respect a caricature of the English fashion, was standing on tiptoe to hold a large iron-gray horse.

Andrea had spoken very little during dinner; he was an intelligent lad, and he feared to utter some absurdity before so many grand people, amongst whom, with dilating eyes, he saw the king's attorney. Then he had been seized upon by Danglars, who, with a rapid glance at the stiff-necked old major and his modest son, and taking into consideration the hospitality of the count, made up his mind that he was in the society of some nabob come to Paris to finish the worldly education of his heir. He contemplated with unspeakable delight the large diamond which shone on the major's little finger; for the major, like a prudent man, in case of any accident happening to his bank-notes, had immediately converted them into an available asset. Then, after dinner, on the pretext of business, he questioned the father and son upon their mode of living; and the father and son, previously informed that it was through Danglars the one was to receive his 48,000 francs and the other 50,000 livres annually, were so full of affability that they would have shaken hands even with the banker's servants, so much did their gratitude need an object to expend itself upon.

One thing above all the rest heightened the respect, nay almost the veneration, of Danglars for Cavalcanti. The latter, faithful to the principle of Horace, nil admirari, had contented himself with showing his knowledge by declaring in what lake the best lampreys were caught. Then he had eaten some without saying a word more; Danglars, therefore, concluded that such luxuries were common at the table of the illustrious descendant of the Cavalcanti, who most likely in Lucca fed upon trout brought from Switzerland, and lobsters sent from England, by the same means used by the count to bring the lampreys from Lake Fusaro, and the sterlet from the Volga. Thus it was with much politeness of manner that he heard Cavalcanti pronounce these words:

‘Tomorrow, sir, I shall have the honour of waiting upon you on business,’
‘And I, sir,’ said Danglars, ‘shall be most happy to receive you.’

Upon which he offered to take Cavalcanti in his carriage to the Hôtel des Princes, if it would not be depriving him of the company of his son. To this Cavalcanti replied by saying that for some time past his son had lived independently of him, that he had his own horses and carriages, and that not having come together, it would not be difficult for them to leave separately. The major seated himself, therefore, by the side of Danglars, who was more and more charmed with the ideas of order and economy which ruled this man, and yet who, being able to allow his son 60,000 francs a year, might be supposed to possess a fortune of 500,000 or 600,000 livres.

As for Andrea, he began, by way of showing off, to scold his groom, who, instead of bringing the tilbury to the steps of the house, had taken it to the outer door, thus giving him the trouble of walking thirty steps to reach it. The groom heard him with humility, took the bit of the impatient animal with his left hand, and with the right held out the reins to Andrea, who, taking them from him, rested his polished boot lightly on the step.

Chapter LXIII

The Dinner

T was evident that one sentiment affected all the guests on entering the dining-room. Each one asked what strange influence had brought them to this house, and yet astonished, even uneasy though they were, they still felt that they would not like to be absent. The recent events, the solitary and eccentric position of the count, his enormous, nay, almost incredible fortune, should have made men cautious, and have altogether prevented ladies visiting a house where there was no one of their own sex to receive them; and yet curiosity had been enough to lead them to overleap the bounds of prudence and decorum.

And all present, even including Cavalcanti and his son, notwithstanding the stiffness of the one and the carelessness of the other, were thoughtful, on finding themselves assembled at the house of this incomprehensible man. Madame Danglars had started when Villefort, on the count's invitation, offered his arm; and Villefort felt that his glance was uneasy beneath his gold spectacles, when he felt the arm of the baroness press upon his own. None of this had escaped the count, and even by this mere contact of individuals the scene had already acquired considerable interest for an observer.

M. de Villefort had on the right hand Madame Danglars, on his left Morrel. The count was seated between Madame de Villefort and Danglars; the other seats were filled by Debray, who was placed between the two Cavalcanti, and by Château-Renaud, seated between Madame de Villefort and Morrel.

The repast was magnificent; Monte Cristo had endeavoured completely to overturn the Parisian ideas, and to feed the curiosity as much as the appetite of his guests. It was an Oriental feast that he offered to them, but of such a kind as the Arabian fairies might be supposed to prepare. Every delicious fruit

At that moment a hand touched his shoulder. The young man turned round, thinking that Danglars or Monte Cristo had forgotten something they wished to tell him, and had returned just as they were starting. But instead of either of these, he saw nothing but a strange face, sunburnt, and encircled by a beard, with eyes brilliant as carbuncles, and a smile upon the mouth which displayed a perfect set of white teeth, pointed and sharp as the wolf's or jackal's. A red handkerchief encircled his gray head; torn and filthy garments covered his large bony limbs, which seemed as though, like those of a skeleton, they would rattle as he walked; and the hand with which he leaned upon the young man's shoulder, and which was the first thing Andrea saw, seemed of gigantic size. Did the young man recognize that face by the light of the lantern in his tilbury, or was he merely struck with the horrible appearance of his interrogator? We cannot say; but only relate the fact that he shuddered and stepped back suddenly.

'What do you want of me?' he asked.

'Pardon me, my friend, if I disturb you,' said the man with the red handkerchief, 'but I want to speak to you.'

'You have no right to beg at night,' said the groom, endeavouring to rid his master of the troublesome intruder.

'I am not begging, my fine fellow,' said the unknown to the servant, with so ironical an expression of the eye, and so frightful a smile, that he withdrew; 'I only wish to say two or three words to your master, who gave me a commission to execute about a fortnight ago.'

'Come,' said Andrea, with sufficient nerve for his servant not to perceive his agitation, 'what do you want? Speak quickly, friend.'

The man said, in a low voice: 'I wish—I wish you to spare me the walk back to Paris. I am very tired, and as I have not eaten so good a dinner as you, I can scarcely stand.'

The young man shuddered at this strange familiarity.

'Tell me,' he said—'tell me what you want?'

'Well, then, I want you to take me up in your fine carriage, and carry me back.' Andrea turned pale, but said nothing.

'Yes,' said the man, thrusting his hands into his pockets, and looking impudently at the youth; 'I have taken the whim into my head; do you understand, Master Benedetto?'

At this name, no doubt, the young man reflected a little, for he went towards his groom, saying:

‘This man is right; I did indeed charge him with a commission, the result of which he must tell me; walk to the barrier, there take a cab, that you may not be too late.’

The surprised groom retired.

‘Let me at least reach a shady spot,’ said Andrea.

‘Oh, as for that, I’ll take you to a splendid place,’ said the man with the handkerchief; and taking the horse’s bit he led the tilbury where it was certainly impossible for anyone to witness the honour that Andrea conferred upon him.

‘Don’t think I want the glory of riding in your fine carriage,’ said he; ‘oh, no, it’s only because I am tired, and also because I have a little business to talk over with you.’

‘Come, step in,’ said the young man. It was a pity this scene had not occurred in daylight, for it was curious to see this rascal throwing himself heavily down on the cushion beside the young and elegant driver of the tilbury. Andrea drove past the last house in the village without saying a word to his companion, who smiled complacently, as though well-pleased to find himself travelling in so comfortable a vehicle. Once out of Auteuil, Andrea looked around, in order to assure himself that he could neither be seen nor heard, and then, stopping the horse and crossing his arms before the man, he asked:

‘Now, tell me why you come to disturb my tranquillity?’

‘Let me ask you why you deceived me?’

‘How have I deceived you?’

‘“How,” do you ask? When we parted at the Pont du Var, you told me you were going to travel through Piedmont and Tuscany; but instead of that, you come to Paris.’

‘How does that annoy you?’

‘It does not; on the contrary, I think it will answer my purpose.’

‘So,’ said Andrea, ‘you are speculating upon me?’

‘What fine words he uses!’

‘I warn you, Master Caderousse, that you are mistaken.’

‘Well, well, don’t be angry, my boy; you know well enough what it is to be unfortunate; and misfortunes make us jealous. I thought you were earning a living in Tuscany or Piedmont by acting as facchino or ciccone, and I pitied thrown open, and Bertuccio appearing said, with a violent effort, ‘The dinner waits.’

The Count of Monte Cristo offered his arm to Madame de Villefort. ‘M. de Villefort,’ he said, ‘will you conduct the Baroness Danglars?’

Villefort complied, and they passed on to the dining-room.