

"I have still a million in gold," continued the king. "I buried it in the vaults of the castle of Newcastle, a moment before I left that city." Charles raised his head with an expression of such painful joy that it would have drawn tears from any one acquainted with his misfortunes.

'A million!' murmured he, 'Oh, count!'

"You alone know that this money exists: employ it when you think it can be of the greatest service to my eldest son. And now, Comte de la Fère, bid me adieu!"

"Adieu, adieu, sire!" cried I.'

Charles arose, and went and leant his burning brow against the window.

'It was then,' continued Athos, 'that the king pronounced the word "REMEMBER!" addressed to me. You see, sire, that I have remembered.'

The king could not resist or conceal his emotion. Athos beheld the movement of his shoulders, which undulated convulsively; he heard the sobs which burst from his over-charged breast. He was silent himself, suffocated by the flood of bitter remembrances he had just poured upon that royal head. Charles II, with a violent effort, left the window, devoured his tears, and came and sat by Athos. 'Sire,' said the latter, 'I thought till to-day that the time had not yet arrived for the employment of that last resource; but, with my eyes fixed upon England, I felt it was approaching. To-morrow I meant to go and inquire in what part of the world your majesty was, and then I purposed going to you. You come to me, sire; that is an indication that God is with us.'

'My lord,' said Charles, in a voice choked by emotion, 'you are, for me, what an angel sent from heaven would be,—you are a preserver sent to me from the tomb of my father himself; but, believe me, for ten years' civil war has passed over my country, striking down men, tearing up soil, it is no more probable that gold should remain in the entrails of the earth, than love in the hearts of my subjects.'

'Sire, the spot in which his majesty buried the million is well known to me, and no one, I am sure, has been able to discover it. Besides, is the castle of Newcastle quite destroyed? Have they demolished its stone by stone, and uprooted the soil to the last tree?'

'No, it is still standing: but at this moment General Monk occupies it and is encamped there. The only spot from which I could look for succour, where I possess a single resource, you see, is invaded by my enemies.'

'General Monk, sire, cannot have discovered the treasure which I speak of.' 'Yes, but can I go and deliver myself up to Monk, in order to recover this treasure? Ah! count, you see plainly I must yield to destiny, since it strikes me to the earth every time I rise. What can I do with Parry as my only servant, with Parry, whom Monk has already driven from his presence? No, no, no, count, we must yield to this last blow.'

'But what your majesty cannot do, and what Parry can no more attempt, do you not believe that I could succeed in accomplishing?'

'You—you, count—you would go?'

'If it please your majesty,' said Athos, bowing to the king, 'yes, I will go, sire.'

'What! you so happy here, count?'

'I am never happy when I have a duty left to accomplish, and it is an imperative duty which the king your father left me to watch over your fortunes, and make a royal use of his money. So, if your majesty honours me with a sign, I will go with you.'

'Ah, monsieur!' said the king, forgetting all royal etiquette and throwing his arms around the neck of Athos, 'you prove to me that there is a God in heaven, and that this God sometimes sends messengers to the unfortunate who groan on the earth.'

Athos, exceedingly moved by this burst of feeling of the young man, thanked him with profound respect, and approached the window. 'Grimaud!' cried he, 'bring out my horses.'

'What, now—immediately?' said the king. 'Ah, monsieur, you are indeed a wonderful man!'

'Sire,' said Athos, 'I know nothing more pressing than your majesty's service. Besides,' added he, smiling, 'it is a habit contracted long since, in the service of the queen your aunt, and of the king your father. How is it possible for me to lose it at the moment your majesty's service calls for it?'

'What a man!' murmured the king.

Then, after a moment's reflection,—'But no, count, I cannot expose you to such privations. I have no means of rewarding such services.'

'Bah!' said Athos, laughing. 'Your majesty is joking; have you not a million? Ah! why am I not possessed of half such a sum! I would already have raised a regiment. But, thank God! I have still a few rolls of gold and some family diamonds left. Your majesty will, I hope, deign to share with a devoted servant.'

'With a friend—yes, count, but on condition that, in his turn, that friend will share with me hereafter!'

'Sire!' said Athos, opening a casket, from which he drew both gold and jewels, 'you see, sire, we are too rich. Fortunately, there are four of us, in the event of our meeting with thieves.'

Joy made the blood rush to the pale cheeks of Charles II, as he saw Athos's two horses, led by Grimaud, already booted for the journey, advance towards the porch.

'Blaisois, this letter for the Vicomte de Bragelonne. For everybody else I am gone to Paris. I confide the house to you, Blaisois.' Blaisois bowed, shook hands with Grimaud, and shut the gate.

now, have never been revealed to any one,—do you know the name of that infernal executioner, of that base wretch who concealed his face that he might assassinate a king with impunity?

Athos became slightly pale. 'His name?' said he, 'yes, I know it, but cannot tell it.'

'And what is become of him, for nobody in England knows his destiny?'

'He is dead.'

'But he did not die in his bed; he did not die a calm and peaceful death; he did not die the death of the good?'

'He died a violent death, in a terrible night, rendered so by the passions of man and a tempest from God. His body, pierced by a dagger, sank to the depths of the ocean. God pardon his murderer!'

'Proceed, then,' said Charles II, seeing that the count was unwilling to say more.

'The king of England, after having, as I have said, spoken thus to the masked executioner, added,—"Observe, you will not strike till I shall stretch out my arms, saying—REMEMBER!"'

'I was aware,' said Charles, in an agitated voice, 'that that was the last word pronounced by my unfortunate father. But why and for whom?'

'For the French gentleman placed beneath his scaffold.'

'For you, then, monsieur?'

'Yes, sire; and every one of the words which he spoke to me, through the planks of the scaffold covered with a black cloth, still sounds in my ears. The king knelt down on one knee: "Comte de la Fère," said he, "are you there?" "Yes, sire," replied I. Then the king stooped towards the boards.'

Charles II, also palpitating with interest, burning with grief, stooped towards Athos, to catch, one by one, every word that escaped from him. His head touched that of the comte.

'Then,' continued Athos, 'the king stooped. "Comte de la Fère," said he, "I could not be saved by you: it was not to be. Now, even though I commit a sacrilege, I must speak to you. Yes, I have spoken to men—yes, I have spoken to God, and I speak to you the last. To sustain a cause which I thought sacred, I have lost the throne of my fathers and the heritage of my children."

Charles II concealed his face in his hands, and a bitter tear glided between his white and slender fingers.

‘Sire,’ said Athos, ‘will your majesty grant me a few minutes, and listen attentively to what remains for me to say to you?’

Charles II looked earnestly at Athos. ‘Willingly, monsieur,’ said he.

‘Then I will show your majesty the way,’ resumed the count, directing his steps towards the house. He then conducted the king to his study, and begged him to be seated. ‘Sire,’ said he, ‘your majesty just now told me that, in the present state of England, a million would suffice for the recovery of your kingdom.’

‘To attempt it at least, monsieur; and to die as a king if I should not succeed.’

‘Well, then, sire, let your majesty, according to the promise you have made me, have the goodness to listen to what I have to say.’ Charles made an affirmative sign with his head. Athos walked straight up to the door, the bolts of which he drew, after looking to see if anybody was near, and then returned. ‘Sire,’ said he, ‘your majesty has kindly remembered that I lent assistance to the very noble and very unfortunate Charles I, when his executioners conducted him from St James’s to Whitehall.’

‘Yes, certainly I do remember it, and always shall remember it.’

‘Sire, it is a dismal history to be heard by a son who no doubt has had it related to him many times; and yet I ought to repeat it to your majesty without omitting one detail.’

‘Speak on, monsieur.’

‘When the king your father ascended the scaffold, or rather when he passed from his chamber to the scaffold, on a level with his window, everything was prepared for his escape. The executioner was got out of the way; a hole contrived under the floor of his apartment; I myself was beneath the funeral vault, which I heard all at once creak beneath his feet.’

‘Parry has related to me all these terrible details, monsieur.’

Athos bowed and resumed. ‘But here is something he had not related to you, sire, for what follows passed between God, your father, and myself; and never has the revelation of it been made even to my dearest friends. ‘Go a little further off,’ said the august prisoner to the executioner; ‘it is but for an instant, and I know that I belong to you; but remember not to strike till I give the signal. I wish to offer up my prayers in freedom.’”

‘Pardon me,’ said Charles II, turning very pale, ‘but you, count, who know so many details of this melancholy event,—details which, as you said just

Chapter XVII

In Which Aramis is Sought, and Only Bazin is Found

Two hours had scarcely elapsed since the departure of the master of the house, who, in Blaisois’s sight, had taken the road to Paris, when a horseman, mounted on a good pied horse, stopped before the gate, and with a sonorous ‘hola!’ called the stable-boys, who, with the gardeners, had formed a circle round Blaisois, the historian-in-ordinary to the household of the château. This ‘hola,’ doubtless well known to Master Blaisois, made him turn his head and exclaim—‘Monsieur d’Arragnan! run quickly, you chaps, and open the gate.’

A swarm of eight brisk lads flew to the gate, which was opened as if it had been made of feathers; and every one loaded him with attentions, for they knew the welcome this friend was accustomed to receive from their master; and for such remarks the eye of the valet may always be depended upon.

‘Ah!’ said M. d’Arragnan, with an agreeable smile, balancing himself upon his stirrup to jump to the ground, ‘where is that dear count?’

‘Ah! how unfortunate you are, monsieur!’ said Blaisois: ‘and how unfortunate will monsieur le comte, our master, think himself when he hears of your coming! As ill luck will have it, monsieur le comte left home two hours ago.’

D’Arragnan did not trouble himself about such trifles. ‘Very good!’ said he. ‘You always speak the best French in the world; you shall give me a lesson in grammar and correct language, whilst I wait the return of your master.’

‘That is impossible, monsieur,’ said Blaisois; ‘you would have to wait too long.’

‘Will he not come back to-day, then?’

'No, not to-morrow, nor the day after to-morrow. Monsieur le comte has gone on a journey.'

'A journey?' said D'Artagnan, surprised; 'that's a fable, Master Blaisois.'

'Monsieur, it is no more than the truth. Monsieur has done me the honour to give me the house in charge; and he added, with his voice so full of authority and kindness—that is all one to me: "You will say I have gone to Paris."

'Well?' cried D'Artagnan, 'since he is gone towards Paris, that is all I wanted to know! you should have told me so at first, booby! He is then two hours in advance?'

'Yes, monsieur.'

'I shall soon overtake him. Is he alone?'

'No, monsieur.'

'Who is with him, then?'

'A gentleman whom I don't know, an old man, and M. Grimaud.'

'Such a party cannot travel as fast as I can—I will start.'

'Will monsieur listen to me an instant?' said Blaisois, laying his hand gently on the reins of the horse.

'Yes, if you don't favour me with fine speeches, and make haste.'

'Well, then, monsieur, that word Paris appears to me to be only an excuse.'

'Oh, oh!' said D'Artagnan, seriously, 'an excuse, eh?'

'Yes, monsieur: and monsieur le comte is not going to Paris, I will swear.'

'What makes you think so?'

'This,—M. Grimaud always knows where our master is going; and he had promised me that the first time he went to Paris, he would take a little money for me to my wife.'

'What, have you a wife, then?'

'I had one—she was of this country; but monsieur thought her a noisy scold, and I sent her to Paris; it is sometimes inconvenient, but very agreeable at others.'

'I understand; but go on. You do not believe the count gone to Paris?'

'No, monsieur; for then M. Grimaud would have broken his word; he would have perjured himself, and that is impossible.'

'That is impossible,' repeated D'Artagnan, quite in a study, because he was quite convinced. 'Well, my brave Blaisois, many thanks to you.'

Blaisois bowed.

'To say so, my lord count, to endeavour to revive hope in my heart, you must have ill understood what I have just told you. I came to Blois to ask of my brother Louis the alms of a million, with which I had the hopes of re-establishing my affairs; and my brother Louis has refused me. You see, then, plainly, that all is lost.'

'Will your majesty permit me to express a contrary opinion?'

'How is that, count? Do you think my heart of so low an order that I do not know how to face my position?'

'Sire, I have always seen that it was in desperate positions that suddenly the great turns of fortune have taken place.'

'I thank you, count: it is some comfort to meet with a heart like yours; that is to say, sufficiently trustful in God and in monarchy, never to despair of a royal fortune, however low it may be fallen. Unfortunately, my dear count, your words are like those remedies they call "sovereign," and which, though able to cure curable wounds or diseases, fail against death. Thank you for your perseverance in consoling me, count, thanks for your devoted remembrance, but I know in what I must trust—nothing will save me now. And see, my friend, I was so convinced, that I was taking the route of exile, with my old Parry; I was returning to devour my poignant griefs in the little hermitage offered me by Holland. There, believe me, count, all will soon be over, and death will come quickly; it is called so often by this body, eaten up by its soul, and by this soul, which aspires to heaven.'

'Your majesty has a mother, a sister, and brothers; your majesty is the head of the family, and ought, therefore, to ask a long life of God, instead of imploring Him for a prompt death. Your majesty is an exile, a fugitive, but you have right on your side; you ought to aspire to combats, dangers, business, and not to rest in heavens.'

'Count,' said Charles II, with a smile of indescribable sadness, 'have you ever heard of a king who reconquered his kingdom with one servant the age of Parry, and with three hundred crowns which that servant carried in his purse?'

'No, sire; but I have heard—and that more than once—that a dethroned king has recovered his kingdom with a firm will, perseverance, some friends, and a million skilfully employed.'

'But you cannot have understood me. The million I asked of my brother Louis was refused me.'

'Oh, the history is soon related,' said Charles. 'Proscribed, despoiled, dined, I resolved, in spite of all my repugnance, to tempt fortune one last time. Is it not written above, that, for our family, all good fortune and all bad fortune shall eternally come from France? You know something of that, monsieur,—you, who are one of the Frenchmen whom my unfortunate father found at the foot of his scaffold, on the day of his death, after having found them at his right hand on the day of battle.'

'Sire,' said Athos modestly, 'I was not alone. My companions and I did, under the circumstances, our duty as gentlemen, and that was all. Your majesty was about to do me the honour to relate—'

'That is true, I had the protection,—pardon my hesitation, count, but, for a Stuart, you, who understand everything, you will comprehend that the word is hard to pronounce;—I had, I say, the protection of my cousin the stadtholder of Holland; but without the intervention, or at least without the authorization of France, the stadtholder would not take the initiative. I came, then, to ask this authorization of the king of France, who has refused me.'

'The king has refused you, sire!'

'Oh, not he; all justice must be rendered to my younger brother Louis; but Monsieur de Mazarin—'

Athos bit his lips.

'You perhaps think I should have expected this refusal?' said the king, who had noticed the movement.

'That was, in truth, my thought, sire,' replied Athos, respectfully; 'I know that Italian of old.'

'Then I determined to come to the test, and know at once the last word of my destiny. I told my brother Louis, that, not to compromise either France or Holland, I would tempt fortune myself in person, as I had already done, with two hundred gentlemen, if he would give them to me; and a million, if he would lend it me.'

'Well, sire?'

'Well, monsieur, I am suffering at this moment something strange, and that is, the satisfaction of despair. There is in certain souls,—and I have just discovered that mine is of the number,—a real satisfaction in the assurance that all is lost, and the time is come to yield.'

'Oh, I hope,' said Athos, 'that your majesty is not come to that extremity.'

'Come, you know I am not curious—I have serious business with your master. Could you not, by a little bit of a word—you who speak so well—give me to understand—one syllable only—I will guess the rest.'

'Upon my word, monsieur, I cannot. I am quite ignorant where monsieur le comte is gone. As to listening at doors, that is contrary to my nature; and besides, it is forbidden here.'

'My dear fellow,' said D'Artagnan, 'this is a very bad beginning for me. Never mind; you know when monsieur le comte will return, at least?'

'As little, monsieur, as the place of his destination.'

'Come, Blaisois, come, search.'

'Monsieur doubts my sincerity? Ah, monsieur, that grieves me much.'

'The devil take his gilded tongue!' grumbled D'Artagnan. 'A clown with a word would be worth a dozen of him. Adieu!'

'Monsieur, I have the honour to present you my respects.'

'Cui-stre!' said D'Artagnan to himself, 'the fellow is unbearable.' He gave another look up to the house, turned his horse's head, and set off like a man who has nothing either annoying or embarrassing in his mind. When he was at the end of the wall, and out of sight,—'Well, now, I wonder,' said he, breathing quickly, 'whether Athos was at home. No; all those idlers, standing with their arms crossed, would have been at work if the eye of the master was near. Athos gone on a journey?—that is incomprehensible. Bah! it is all devilish mysterious! And then—no—he is not the man I want. I want one of a cunning, patient mind. My business is at Melun, in a certain presbytery I am acquainted with. Forty-five leagues—four days and a half! Well, it is fine weather, and I am free. Never mind the distance!'

And he put his horse into a trot, directing his course towards Paris. On the fourth day he alighted at Melun, as he had intended.

D'Artagnan was never in the habit of asking any one on the road for any common information. For these sorts of details, unless in very serious circumstances, he confided in his perspicacity, which was so seldom at fault, in his experience of thirty years, and in a great habit of reading the physiognomies of houses, as well as those of men. At Melun, D'Artagnan immediately found the presbytery—a charming house, plastered over red brick, with vines climbing along the gutters, and a cross, in carved stone, surmounting the ridge of the roof. From the ground-floor of this house came a noise, or rather a confusion of voices, like the chirping of young birds when the brood is just hatched under the down. One of these voices was spelling the alphabet distinctly. A voice thick, yet pleasant, at the same time scolded the talkers and corrected the faults of the reader. D'Aragnan recognized that voice, and as the window of the ground-floor was open, he leant down from his horse under the branches and red fibres of the vine and cried, 'Bazin, my dear Bazin! good-day to you.'

A short, fat man, with a flat face, a cranium ornamented with a crown of gray hairs, cut short, in imitation of a tonsure, and covered with an old black velvet cap, arose as soon as he heard D'Aragnan—we ought not to say arose, but bounded up. In fact, Bazin bounded up, carrying with him his little low chair, which the children tried to take away, with battles more fierce than those of the Greeks endeavouring to recover the body of Patroclus from the hands of the Trojans. Bazin did more than bound; he let fall both his alphabet and his ferule. 'You!' said he; 'you, Monsieur D'Aragnan?'

'Yes, myself! Where is Aramis—no, M. le Chevalier d'Herblay—no, I am still mistaken—Monsieur le Vicaire-General?'

'Ah, monsieur,' said Bazin, with dignity, 'monseigneur is at his diocese.'

'What did you say?' said D'Aragnan. Bazin repeated the sentence.

'Ah, ah! but has Aramis a diocese?'

'Yes, monsieur. Why not?'

'Is he a bishop, then?'

'Why, where can you come from,' said Bazin, rather irreverently, 'that you don't know that?'

'My dear Bazin, we pagans, we men of the sword, know very well when a man is made a colonel, or maitre-de-camp, or marshal of France; but if he be made a bishop, arch-bishop, or pope—devil take me if the news reaches us before the three quarters of the earth have had the advantage of it!'

'Hush! hush!' said Bazin, opening his eyes: 'do not spoil these poor children, in whom I am endeavouring to inculcate such good principles.' In fact, the children had surrounded D'Aragnan, whose horse, long sword, spurs, and martial air they very much admired. But above all, they admired his strong voice; so that, when he uttered his oath, the whole school cried out, 'The devil take me!' with fearful bursts of laughter, shouts, and bounds, which delighted the musketeer, and bewildered the old pedagogue.

by the concise explanation of Grimaud,—'At the back, under the chestnut trees,' he left, therefore, the house on the left, and went straight down the path indicated. The thing was easy; the tops of those noble trees, already covered with leaves and flowers, rose above all the rest.

On arriving under the lozenges, by turns luminous and dark, which chequered the ground of this path according as the trees were more or less in leaf, the young prince perceived a gentleman walking with his arms behind him, apparently plunged in a deep meditation. Without doubt, he had often had this gentleman described to himself, for, without hesitating, Charles II walked straight up to him. At the sound of his footsteps, the Comte de la Fère raised his head, and seeing an unknown man of noble and elegant carriage coming towards him, he raised his hat and waited. At some paces from him, Charles II likewise took off his hat. Then, as if in reply to the comte's mute interrogation,—

'Monsieur le Comte,' said he, 'I come to discharge a debt towards you. I have, for a long time, had the expression of a profound gratitude to bring you. I am Charles II, son of Charles Stuart, who reigned in England, and died on the scaffold.'

On hearing this illustrious name, Athos felt a kind of shudder creep through his veins, but at the sight of the young prince standing uncovered before him, and stretching out his hand towards him, two tears, for an instant, dimmed his brilliant eyes. He bent respectfully, but the prince took him by the hand.

'See how unfortunate I am, my lord count; it is only due to chance that I have met with you. Alas! I ought to have people around me whom I love and honour, whereas I am reduced to preserve their services in my heart, and their names in my memory: so that if your servant had not recognized mine, I should have passed by your door as by that of a stranger.'

'It is but too true,' said Athos, replying with his voice to the first part of the king's speech, and with a bow to the second; 'it is but too true, indeed, that your majesty has seen many evil days.'

'And the worst, alas!' replied Charles, 'are perhaps still to come.'

'Sire, let us hope.'

'Count, count,' continued Charles, shaking his head, 'I entertained hope till last night, and that of a good Christian, I swear.'

Athos looked at the king as if to interrogate him.

had he recognized the younger of the two travellers, than he clapped his hands together, with respectful surprise, and, raising his hat from his head, bowed so profoundly that it might have been said he was kneeling. This demonstration, however absent, or rather, however absorbed was the king in his reflections, attracted his attention instantly; and checking his horse and turning towards Parry, he exclaimed, 'Good God, Parry, who is that man who salutes me in such a marked manner? Can he know me, think you?'

Parry, much agitated and very pale, had already turned his horse towards the gate. 'Ah, sire!' said he, stopping suddenly at five or six paces' distance from the still bending old man: 'sire, I am seized with astonishment, for I think I recognize that brave man. Yes, it must be he! Will your majesty permit me to speak to him?'

'Certainly.'

'Can it be you, Monsieur Grimaud?' asked Parry.

'Yes, it is I,' replied the tall old man, drawing himself up, but without losing his respectful demeanour.

'Sire,' then said Parry, 'I was not deceived. This good man is the servant of the Comte de la Fère, and the Comte de la Fère, if you remember, is the worthy gentleman of whom I have so often spoken to your majesty that the remembrance of him must remain, not only in your mind, but in your heart.'

'He who assisted my father at his last moments?' asked Charles, evidently affected at the remembrance.

'The same, sire.'

'Alas!' said Charles; and then addressing Grimaud, whose penetrating and intelligent eyes seemed to search and divine his thoughts.—'My friend,' said he, 'does your master, Monsieur le Comte de la Fère, live in this neighbourhood?'

'There,' replied Grimaud, pointing with his outstretched arm to the white-and-red house behind the gate.

'And is Monsieur le Comte de la Fère at home at present?'

'At the back, under the chestnut trees.'

'Parry,' said the king, 'I will not miss this opportunity, so precious for me, to thank the gentleman to whom our house is indebted for such a noble example of devotedness and generosity. Hold my horse, my friend, if you please.' And, throwing the bridle to Grimaud, the king entered the abode of Athos, quite alone, as one equal enters the dwelling of another. Charles had been informed

'There!' said he, 'hold your tongues, you brats! You have come, M. d'Aragnan, and all my good principles fly away. With you, as usual, comes disorder. Babel is revived. Ah! Good Lord! Ah! the wild little wretches! And the worthy Bazin distributed right and left blows which increased the cries of his scholars by changing the nature of them.'

'At least,' said he, 'you will no longer decoy any one here.'

'Do you think so?' said D'Aragnan, with a smile which made a shudder creep over the shoulders of Bazin.

'He is capable of it,' murmured he.

'Where is your master's diocese?'

'Monsieur Rene is bishop of Vannes.'

'Who had him nominated?'

'Why, monsieur le surintendant, our neighbour.'

'What! Monsieur Fouquet?'

'To be sure he did.'

'Is Aramis on good terms with him, then?'

'Monsieur preached every Sunday at the house of monsieur le surintendant at Vaux; then they hunted together.'

'Ah!'

'And monseigneur composed his homilies—no, I mean his sermons—with monsieur le surintendant.'

'Bah! he preached in verse, then, this worthy bishop?'

'Monsieur, for the love of heaven, do not jest with sacred things.'

'There, Bazin, there! So, then, Aramis is at Vannes?'

'At Vannes, in Bretagne.'

'You are a deceitful old hunk, Bazin; that is not true.'

'See, monsieur, if you please; the apartments of the presbytery are empty.'

'He is right there,' said D'Aragnan, looking attentively at the house, the aspect of which announced solitude.

'But monseigneur must have written you an account of his promotion.'

'When did it take place?'

'A month back.'

'Oh! then there is no time lost. Aramis cannot yet have wanted me. But how is it, Bazin, you do not follow your master?'

'Monsieur, I cannot; I have occupations.'

‘Your alphabet?’

‘And my penitents.’

‘What, do you confess, then? Are you a priest?’

‘The same as one. I have such a call.’

‘But the orders?’

‘Oh,’ said Bazin, without hesitation, ‘now that monseigneur is a bishop, I shall soon have my orders, or at least my dispensations.’ And he rubbed his hands.

‘Decidedly,’ said D’Artagnan to himself, ‘there will be no means of uprooting these people. Get me some supper, Bazin.’

‘With pleasure, monsieur.’

‘A fowl, a bouillon, and a bottle of wine.’

‘This is Saturday night, monsieur—it is a day of abstinence.’

‘I have a dispensation,’ said D’Artagnan.

Bazin looked at him suspiciously.

‘Ah, ah, master hypocrite!’ said the musketeer, ‘for whom do you take me? If you, who are the valet, hope for dispensation to commit a crime, shall not I, the friend of your bishop, have dispensation for eating meat at the call of my stomach? Make yourself agreeable with me, Bazin, or by heavens! I will complain to the king, and you shall never confess. Now you know that the nomination of bishops rests with the king—I have the king, I am the stronger.’ Bazin smiled hypocritically. ‘Ah, but we have monsieur le surintendant,’ said he.

‘And you laugh at the king, then?’

Bazin made no reply; his smile was sufficiently eloquent.

‘My supper,’ said D’Artagnan, ‘it is getting towards seven o’clock.’

Bazin turned round and ordered the eldest of the pupils to inform the cook. In the meantime, D’Artagnan surveyed the presbytery.

‘Phew!’ said he, disdainfully, ‘monseigneur lodged his grandeur very meanly here.’

‘We have the château de Vaux,’ said Bazin.

‘Which is perhaps equal to the Louvre?’ said D’Artagnan, jeeringly.

‘Which is better,’ replied Bazin, with the greatest coolness imaginable.

‘Ah, ah!’ said D’Artagnan.

Chapter XVI

‘Remember!’

horseman going rapidly along the road leading towards Blois, which he had left nearly half an hour before, passed the two travellers, and, though apparently in haste, raised his hat as he passed them. The king scarcely observed this young man, who was about twenty-five years of age, and who, turning round several times, made friendly signals to a man standing before the gate of a handsome white-and-red house; that is to say, built of brick and stone, with a slated roof, situated on the left hand of the road the prince was travelling.

This man, old, tall, and thin, with white hair,—we speak of the one standing by the gate;—this man replied to the farewell signals of the young one by signs of parting as tender as could have been made by a father. The young man disappeared at the first turn of the road, bordered by fine trees, and the old man was preparing to return to the house, when the two travellers, arriving in front of the gate, attracted his attention.

The king, as we have said, was riding with his head cast down, his arms inert, leaving his horse to go what pace he liked, whilst Parry, behind him, the better to imbibe the genial influence of the sun, had taken off his hat, and was looking about right and left. His eyes encountered those of the old man leaning against the gate; the latter, as if struck by some strange spectacle, uttered an exclamation, and made one step towards the two travellers. From Parry his eyes immediately turned towards the king, upon whom they rested for an instant. This examination, however rapid, was instantly reflected in a visible manner upon the features of the tall old man. For scarcely had he recognized the younger of the travellers—and we said recognized, for nothing but a perfect recognition could have explained such an act—scarcely, we say,

Such were the ideas of the unfortunate prince while sitting listlessly upon his horse, to which he abandoned the reins: he rode slowly along beneath the warm May sun, in which the sombre misanthropy of the exile perceived a last insult to his grief.

He would perhaps have prolonged the discussion, and maintained the superiority of the Louvre, but the lieutenant perceived that his horse remained fastened to the bars of a gate.

‘The devil!’ said he. ‘Get my horse looked after; your master the bishop has none like him in his stables.’

Bazin cast a sidelong glance at the horse, and replied, ‘Monsieur le surintendant gave him four from his own stables; and each of the four is worth four of yours.’

The blood mounted to the face of D’Arragnan. His hand itched and his eye glanced over the head of Bazin, to select the place upon which he should discharge his anger. But it passed away; reflection came, and D’Arragnan contented himself with saying,—

‘The devil! the devil! I have done well to quit the service of the king. Tell me, worthy Master Bazin,’ added he, ‘how many musketeers does monsieur le surintendant retain in his service?’

‘He could have all there are in the kingdom with his money,’ replied Bazin, closing his book, and dismissing the boys with some kindly blows of his cane.

‘The devil! the devil!’ repeated D’Arragnan, once more, as if to annoy the pedagogue. But as supper was now announced, he followed the cook, who introduced him into the refectory, where it awaited him. D’Arragnan placed himself at the table, and began a hearty attack upon his fowl.

‘It appears to me,’ said D’Arragnan, biting with all his might at the tough fowl they had served up to him, and which they had evidently forgotten to fatten,—‘it appears that I have done wrong in not seeking service with that master yonder. A powerful noble this intendant, seemingly! In good truth, we poor fellows know nothing at the court, and the rays of the sun prevent our seeing the large stars, which are also suns, at a little greater distance from our earth,—that is all.’

As D’Arragnan delighted, both from pleasure and system, in making people talk about things which interested him, he fenced in his best style with Master Bazin, but it was pure loss of time; beyond the tiresome and hyperbolic praises of monsieur le surintendant of the finances, Bazin, who, on his side, was on his guard, afforded nothing but platitudes to the curiosity of D’Arragnan, so that our musketeer, in a tolerably bad humour, desired to go to bed as soon as he had supped. D’Arragnan was introduced by Bazin into a mean chamber, in which there was a poor bed; but D'Arragnan was not fastidious in that respect. He had been told that Aramis had taken away the key of his own private apartment, and as he knew Aramis was a very particular man, and had generally many things to conceal in his apartment, he had not been surprised. He, therefore, although it seemed comparatively even harder, attacked the bed as bravely as he had done the fowl; and, as he had as good an inclination to sleep as he had had to eat, he took scarcely longer time to be snoring harmoniously than he had employed in picking the last bones of the bird.

Since he was no longer in the service of any one, D'Arragnan had promised himself to indulge in sleeping as soundly as he had formerly slept lightly; but with whatever good faith D'Arragnan had made himself this promise, and whatever desire he might have to keep it religiously, he was awakened in the middle of the night by a loud noise of carriages, and servants on horseback. A sudden illumination flashed over the walls of his chamber; he jumped out of bed and ran to the window in his shirt. 'Can the king be coming this way?' he thought, rubbing his eyes; 'in truth, such a suite can only be attached to royalty.'

'Vive le monsieur le surintendant!' cried, or rather vociferated, from a window on the ground-floor, a voice which he recognized as Bazin's, who at the same time waved a handkerchief with one hand, and held a large candle in the other. D'Arragnan then saw something like a brilliant human form leaning out of the principal carriage; at the same time loud bursts of laughter, caused, no doubt, by the strange figure of Bazin, and issuing from the same carriage, left, as it were, a train of joy upon the passage of the rapid cortège.

'I might easily see it was not the king,' said D'Arragnan; 'people don't laugh so heartily when the king passes. Hola, Bazin!' cried he to his neighbour, three-quarters of whose body still hung out of the window, to follow the carriage with his eyes as long as he could. 'What is all that about?'

'It is M. Fouquet,' said Bazin, in a patronizing tone.

'And all those people?'

'That is the court of M. Fouquet.'

'Oh, oh!' said D'Arragnan; 'what would M. de Mazarin say to that if he heard it?' And he returned to his bed, asking himself how Aramis always contrived to be protected by the most powerful personages in the kingdom. 'Is it that he has more luck than I, or that I am a greater fool than he? Bah! That

At length the noise of some heavy carts descending towards the Loire awakened Charles. He arose, looked around him like a man who has forgotten everything, perceived Parry, shook him by the hand, and commanded him to settle the reckoning with Master Cropole. Master Cropole, being called upon to settle his account with Parry, acquitted himself, it must be allowed, like an honest man; he only made his customary remark, that the two travellers had eaten nothing, which had the double disadvantage of being humiliating for his kitchen, and of forcing him to ask payment for a repast not consumed, but not the less lost. Parry had nothing to say to the contrary, and paid.

'I hope,' said the king, 'it has not been the same with the horses. I don't see that they have eaten at your expense, and it would be a misfortune for travellers like us, who have a long journey to make, to have our horses fail us.'

But Cropole, at this doubt, assumed his majestic air, and replied that the stables of les Medici were not less hospitable than its refectory.

The king mounted his horse; his old servant did the same, and both set out towards Paris, without meeting a single person on their road, in the streets or the faubourgs of the city. For the prince the blow was the more severe, as it was a fresh exile. The unfortunates cling to the smallest hopes; as the happy do to the greatest good; and when they are obliged to quit the place where that hope has soothed their hearts, they experience the mortal regret which the banished man feels when he places his foot upon the vessel which is to bear him into exile. It appears that the heart already wounded so many times suffers from the least scratch; it appears that it considers as a good the momentary absence of evil, which is nothing but the absence of pain; and that God, into the most terrible misfortunes, has thrown hope as the drop of water which the rich sinner in hell entreated of Lazarus.

For one instant even the hope of Charles II had been more than a fugitive joy;—that was when he found himself so kindly welcomed by his brother king; then it had taken a form that had become a reality; then, all at once, the refusal of Mazarin had reduced the fictitious reality to the state of a dream. This promise of Louis XIV, so soon retracted, had been nothing but a mockery; a mockery like his crown—like his sceptre—like his friends—like all that had surrounded his royal childhood, and which had abandoned his proscribed youth. Mockery! everything was a mockery for Charles II except the cold, black repose promised by death.