

courier, he could not withhold at the spectacle of royal distress so dignified, yet so intense.

Chapter XL

Uncle and Nephew

HE horse and servant belonging to De Winter were waiting for him at the door; he proceeded toward his abode very thoughtfully, looking behind him from time to time to contemplate the dark and silent frontage of the Louvre. It was then that he saw a horseman, as it were, detach himself from the wall and follow him at a little distance. In leaving the Palais Royal he remembered to have observed a similar shadow.

'Tony,' he said, motioning to his groom to approach.

'Here I am, my lord.'

'Did you remark that man who is following us?'

'Yes, my lord.'

'Who is he?'

'I do not know, only he has followed your grace from the Palais Royal, stopped at the Louvre to wait for you, and now leaves the Louvre with you.'

'Some spy of the cardinal,' said De Winter to him, aside. 'Let us pretend not to notice that he is watching us.'

And spurring on he plunged into the labyrinth of streets which led to his hôtel, situated near the Marais, for having for so long a time lived near the Place Royale, Lord de Winter naturally returned to lodge near his ancient dwelling.

The unknown spurred his horse to a gallop.

De Winter dismounted at his hôtel and went up into his apartment, intending to watch the spy; but as he was about to place his gloves and hat on a table, he saw reflected in a glass opposite to him a figure which stood on the threshold of the room. He turned around and Mordaunt stood before him.

hope. Providence has declared for us, since I have found this brave man again in so miraculous a manner. And, sir, where does he reside, pray?

'The Comte de la Fère lodges in the Rue Guénégaud, Hôtel du "Grand Roi Charlemagne."'

'Thanks, sir. Inform this dear friend that he may remain within, that I shall go and see him immediately.'

'Sir, I obey with pleasure, if her majesty will permit me to depart.'

'Go, Monsieur de Bragelonne,' said the queen, 'and rest assured of our affection.'

Raoul bent respectfully before the two princesses, and bowing to De Winter, departed.

The queen and De Winter continued to converse for some time in low voices, in order that the young princess should not overhear them; but the precaution was needless: she was in deep converse with her own thoughts.

Then, when De Winter rose to take leave:

'Listen, my lord,' said the queen; 'I have preserved this diamond cross which came from my mother, and this order of St Michael which came from my husband. They are worth about fifty thousand pounds. I had sworn to die of hunger rather than part with these precious pledges; but now that this ornament may be useful to him or his defenders, everything must be sacrificed. Take them, and if you need money for your expedition, sell them fearlessly, my lord. But should you find the means of retaining them, remember, my lord, that I shall esteem you as having rendered the greatest service that a gentleman can render to a queen, and in the day of my prosperity he who brings me this order and this cross shall be blessed by me and my children.'

'Madame,' replied De Winter, 'your majesty will be served by a man devoted to you. I hasten to deposit these two objects in a safe place, nor should I accept them if the resources of our ancient fortune were left to us, but our estates are confiscated, our ready money is exhausted, and we are reduced to turn to service everything we possess. In an hour hence I shall be with the Comte de la Fère, and to-morrow your majesty shall have a definite reply.'

The queen tendered her hand to Lord de Winter, who, kissing it respectfully, went out and traversed alone and unconducted those large, dark and deserted apartments, brushing away tears which, blasé as he was by fifty years spent as a

HE SAW A HORSEMAN FOLLOW HIM AT A LITTLE DISTANCE

At the moment mention occurred of his having rendered a service to the count, Raoul could not help turning his glance toward the young princess, and then he saw in her eyes an expression of infinite gratitude to the young man; he no longer doubted that the daughter of King Charles I loved his friend.

‘The battle of Lens gained!’ said the queen; ‘they are lucky here indeed; they can gain battles! Yes, the Maréchal de Grammont is right; this will change the aspect of French affairs, but I much fear it will do nothing for English, even if it does not harm them. This is recent news, sir,’ continued she, ‘and I thank you for having made such haste to bring it to me; without this letter I should not have heard till to-morrow, perhaps after to-morrow—the last of all Paris.’

‘Madame,’ said Raoul, ‘the Louvre is but the second palace this news has reached; it is as yet unknown to all, and I had sworn to the Count de Guiche to remit this letter to your majesty before even I should embrace my guardian.’

‘Your guardian! is he, too, a Bragelonne?’ asked Lord de Winter. ‘I once knew a Bragelonne—is he still alive?’

‘No, sir, he is dead; and I believe it is from him my guardian, whose near relation he was, inherited the estate from which I take my name.’

‘And your guardian, sir,’ asked the queen, who could not help feeling some interest in the handsome young man before her, ‘what is his name?’

‘The Comte de la Fère, madame,’ replied the young man, bowing.

De Winter made a gesture of surprise and the queen turned to him with a start of joy.

‘The Comte de la Fère!’ she cried. ‘Have you not mentioned that name to me?’

As for De Winter he could scarcely believe that he had heard aright. ‘The Comte de la Fère!’ he cried in his turn. ‘Oh, sir, reply, I entreat you—is not the Comte de la Fère a noble whom I remember, handsome and brave, a musketeer under Louis XIII, who must be now about forty-seven or forty-eight years of age?’

‘Yes, sir, you are right in every particular!’

‘And who served under an assumed name?’

‘Under the name of Athos. Latterly I heard his friend, Monsieur d’Aragnan, give him that name.’

‘That is it, madame, that is the same. God be praised! And he is in Paris?’ continued he, addressing Raoul; then turning to the queen: ‘We may still

There was a moment of frozen silence between these two.

‘Sir,’ said De Winter, ‘I thought I had already made you aware that I am weary of this persecution; withdraw, then, or I shall call and have you turned out as you were in London. I am not your uncle, I know you not.’

‘My uncle,’ replied Mordaunt, with his harsh and bantering tone, ‘you are mistaken; you will not have me turned out this time as you did in London—you dare not. As for denying that I am your nephew, you will think twice about it, now that I have learned some things of which I was ignorant a year ago.’

‘And how does it concern me what you have learned?’ said De Winter.

‘Oh, it concerns you very closely, my uncle, I am sure, and you will soon be of my opinion,’ added he, with a smile which sent a shudder through the veins of him he thus addressed. ‘When I presented myself before you for the first time in London, it was to ask you what had become of my fortune; the second time it was to demand who had sullied my name; and this time I come before you to ask a question far more terrible than any other, to say to you as God said to the first murderer: “Cain, what hast thou done to thy brother Abel?” My lord, what have you done with your sister—your sister, who was my mother?’

De Winter shrank back from the fire of those scorching eyes.

‘Your mother?’ he said.

‘Yes, my lord, my mother,’ replied the young man, advancing into the room until he was face to face with Lord de Winter, and crossing his arms. ‘I have asked the headsmen of Bethune,’ he said, his voice hoarse and his face livid with passion and grief. ‘And the headsmen of Bethune gave me a reply.’

De Winter fell back in a chair as though struck by a thunderbolt and in vain attempted a reply.

‘Yes,’ continued the young man; ‘all is now explained; with this key I open the abyss. My mother inherited an estate from her husband, you have assassinated her; my name would have secured me the paternal estate, you have deprived me of it; you have despoiled me of my fortune. I am no longer astonished that you knew me not. I am not surprised that you refused to recognise me. When a man is a robber it is hard to call him nephew whom he has impoverished; when one is a murderer, to recognise the man whom one has made an orphan.’

These words produced a contrary effect to that which Mordaunt had anticipated. De Winter remembered the monster that Milady had been; he rose, dignified and calm, restraining by the severity of his look the wild glance of the young man.

'You desire to fathom this horrible secret?' said De Winter; 'well, then, so be it. Know, then, what manner of woman it was for whom to-day you call me to account. That woman had, in all probability, poisoned my brother, and in order to inherit from me she was about to assassinate me in my turn. I have proof of it. What say you to that?'

'I say that she was my mother.'

'She caused the unfortunate Duke of Buckingham to be stabbed by a man who was, ere that, honest, good and pure. What say you to that crime, of which I have the proof?'

'She was my mother.'

'On our return to France she had a young woman who was attached to one of her opponents poisoned in the convent of the Augustines at Béthune. Will this crime persuade you of the justice of her punishment—for of all this I have the proofs?'

'She was my mother!' cried the young man, who uttered these three successive exclamations with constantly increasing force.

'At last, charged with murders, with debauchery, hated by every one and yet threatening still, like a panther thirsting for blood, she fell under the blows of men whom she had rendered desperate, though they had never done her the least injury; she met with judges whom her hideous crimes had evoked; and that executioner you saw—that executioner who you say told you everything—that executioner, if he told you everything, told you that he leaped with joy in avenging on her his brother's shame and suicide. Depraved as a girl, adulterous as a wife, an unnatural sister, homicide, poisoner, execrated by all who knew her, by every nation that had been visited by her, she died accursed by Heaven and earth.'

A sob which Mordaunt could not repress burst from his throat and his livid face became suffused with blood; he clenched his fists, sweat covered his face, his hair, like Hamlet's, stood on end, and racked with fury he cried out:

'Silence, sir! she was my mother! Her crimes, I know them not; her disorders, I know them not; her vices, I know them not. But this I know, that

'Yes, madame,' said the young man.

At this announcement of a battle having taken place, the princess opened her mouth as though to ask a question of interest; but her lips closed again without articulating a word, while the colour gradually faded from her cheeks.

The queen saw this, and doubtless her maternal heart translated the emotion, for addressing Raoul again:

'And no evil has happened to the young Count de Guiche?' she asked; 'for not only is he our servant, as you say, sir, but more—he is one of our friends.'

'No, madame,' replied Raoul; 'on the contrary, he gained great glory and had the honour of being embraced by his highness, the prince, on the field of battle.'

The young princess clapped her hands; and then, ashamed of having been betrayed into such a demonstration of joy, she half turned away and bent over a vase of roses, as if to inhale their odour.

'Let us see,' said the queen, 'what the count says.' And she opened the letter and read:

Madame,

Being unable to have the honour of writing to you myself, by reason of a wound I have received in my right hand, I have commanded my son, the Count de Guiche, who, with his father, is equally your humble servant, to write to tell you that we have just gained the battle of Lens, and that this victory cannot fail to give great power to Cardinal Mazarin and to the queen over the affairs of Europe. If her majesty will have faith in my counsels she ought to profit by this event to address at this moment, in favour of her august husband, the court of France. The Vicomte de Bragelonne, who will have the honour of remitting this letter to your majesty, is the friend of my son, who owes to him his life; he is a gentleman in whom your majesty may confide entirely, in case your majesty may have some verbal or written order to remit to me.

I have the honour to be, with respect, etc.,

MARÉCHAL DE GRAMMONT.

‘Why, then, do you always weep, mother, when I am away from you?’ she said.

The queen smiled, but instead of answering:

‘See, De Winter,’ she said, ‘I have at least gained one thing in being only half a queen, and that is that my children call me “mother” instead of “madame.”’

Then turning toward her daughter:

‘What do you want, Henrietta?’ she demanded.

‘My mother,’ replied the young princess, ‘a cavalier has just entered the Louvre and wishes to present his respects to your majesty; he arrives from the army and has, he says, a letter to remit to you, on the part of the Maréchal de Grammont, I think.’

‘Ah!’ said the queen to De Winter, ‘he is one of my faithful adherents; but do you not observe, my dear lord, that we are so poorly served that it is left to my daughter to fill the office of doorkeeper?’

‘Madame, have pity on me,’ exclaimed De Winter, ‘you wring my heart!’

‘And who is this cavalier, Henrietta?’ asked the queen.

‘I saw him from the window, madame; he is a young man that appears scarce sixteen years of age, and is called the Viscount de Bragelonne.’

The queen, smiling, made a sign with her head; the young princess opened the door and Raoul appeared on the threshold.

Advancing a few steps toward the queen, he knelt down.

‘Madame,’ said he, ‘I bear to your majesty a letter from my friend the Count de Guiche, who told me he had the honour of being your servant; this letter contains important news and the expression of his respect.’

At the name of the Count de Guiche a blush spread over the cheeks of the young princess and the queen glanced at her with some degree of severity.

‘You told me that the letter was from the Maréchal de Grammont, Henrietta?’ said the queen.

‘I thought so, madame,’ stammered the young girl.

‘It is my fault, madame,’ said Raoul. ‘I did announce myself, in truth, as coming on the part of the Maréchal de Grammont; but being wounded in the right arm he was unable to write and therefore the Count de Guiche acted as his secretary.’

‘There has been fighting, then?’ asked the queen, motioning to Raoul to rise.

I had a mother, that five men leagued against one woman, murdered her clandestinely by night—silently—like cowards. I know that you were one of them, my uncle, and that you cried louder than the others: “She must die.” Therefore I warn you, and listen well to my words, that they may be engraved upon your memory, never to be forgotten: this murder, which has robbed me of everything—this murder, which has deprived me of my name—this murder, which has impoverished me—this murder, which has made me corrupt, wicked, implacable—I shall summon you to account for it first and then those who were your accomplices, when I discover them!’

With hatred in his eyes, foaming at his mouth, and his fist extended, Mordaunt had advanced one more step, a threatening, terrible step, toward De Winter. The latter put his hand to his sword, and said, with the smile of a man who for thirty years has jested with death:

‘Would you assassinate me, sir? Then I shall recognise you as my nephew, for you would be a worthy son of such a mother.’

‘No,’ replied Mordaunt, forcing his features and the muscles of his body to resume their usual places and be calm; ‘no, I shall not kill you; at least not at this moment, for without you I could not discover the others. But when I have found them, then tremble, sir. I stabbed to the heart the headsmen of Béthune, without mercy or pity, and he was the least guilty of you all.’

With these words the young man went out and descended the stairs with sufficient calmness to pass unobserved; then upon the lowest landing place he passed Tony, leaning over the balustrade, waiting only for a call from his master to mount to his room.

But De Winter did not call; crushed, enfeebled, he remained standing and with listening ear; then only when he had heard the step of the horse going away he fell back on a chair, saying:

‘My God, I thank Thee that he knows me only.’

'Oh, mon Dieu, it is a matter of the greatest urgency to find them out,' said the queen, 'since you think these worthy gentlemen might be so useful to the king.'

'Oh, yes,' said De Winter, 'for they are the same men. Listen, madame, and recall your remembrances. Have you never heard that Queen Anne of Austria was once saved from the greatest danger ever incurred by a queen?'

'Yes, at the time of her relations with Monsieur de Buckingham; it had to do in some way with certain studs and diamonds.'

'Well, it was that affair, madame; these men are the ones who saved her; and I smile with pity when I reflect that if the names of those gentlemen are unknown to you it is because the queen has forgotten them, who ought to have made them the first noblemen of the realm.'

'Well, then, my lord, they must be found; but what can four men, or rather three men do—for I tell you, you must not count on Monsieur d'Aragnan.'

'It will be one valiant sword the less, but there will remain still three, without reckoning my own; now four devoted men around the king to protect him from his enemies, to be at his side in battle, to aid him with counsel, to escort him in flight, are sufficient, not to make the king a conqueror, but to save him if conquered; and whatever Mazarin may say, once on the shores of France your royal husband may find as many retreats and asylums as the seabird finds in a storm.'

'Seek, then, my lord, seek these gentlemen; and if they will consent to go with you to England, I will give to each a duchy the day that we reascend the throne, besides as much gold as would pave Whitehall. Seek them, my lord, and find them, I conjure you.'

'I will search for them, madame,' said De Winter 'and doubtless I shall find them; but time fails me. Has your majesty forgotten that the king expects your reply and awaits it in agony?'

'Then indeed we are lost!' cried the queen, in the fullness of a broken heart. At this moment the door opened and the young Henrietta appeared; then the queen, with that wonderful strength which is the privilege of parents, repressed her tears and motioned to De Winter to change the subject.

But that act of self-control, effective as it was, did not escape the eyes of the young princess. She stopped on the threshold, breathed a sigh, and addressing the queen:

as I am to eat the bread of exile and to ask hospitality from false friends who smile at my tears; and as regards his royal person, he must sacrifice it generously and die like a king. I shall go and die by his side.'

'Madame, madame,' exclaimed De Winter, 'your majesty abandons yourself to despair; and yet, perhaps, there still remains some hope.'

'No friends left, my lord; no other friends left in the wide world but yourself. Oh, God!' exclaimed the poor queen, raising her eyes to Heaven, 'have You indeed taken back all the generous hearts that once existed in the world?'

'I hope not, madame,' replied De Winter, thoughtfully; 'I once spoke to you of four men.'

'What can be done with four?'

'Four devoted, resolute men can do much, assure yourself, madame; and those of whom I speak performed great things at one time.'

'And where are these four men?'

'Ah, that is what I do not know. It is twenty years since I saw them, and yet whenever I have seen the king in danger I have thought of them.'

'And these men were your friends?'

'One of them held my life in his hands and gave it to me. I know not whether he is still my friend, but since that time I have remained his.'

'And these men are in France, my lord?'

'I believe so.'

'Tell me their names; perhaps I may have heard them mentioned and might be able to aid you in finding them.'

'One of them was called the Chevalier d'Aragnan.'

'Ah, my lord, if I mistake not, the Chevalier d'Aragnan is lieutenant of royal guards; but take care, for I fear that this man is entirely devoted to the cardinal.'

'That would be a misfortune,' said De Winter, 'and I shall begin to think that we are really doomed.'

'But the others,' said the queen, who clung to this last hope as a shipwrecked man clings to the hull of his vessel. 'The others, my lord!'

'The second—I heard his name by chance; for before fighting us, these four gentlemen told us their names; the second was called the Comte de la Fère. As for the two others, I had so much the habit of calling them by nicknames that I have forgotten their real ones.'

Chapter XII

Paternal Affection

MUST this terrible scene was passing at Lord de Winter's, Athos, seated near his window, his elbow on the table and his head supported on his hand, was listening intently to Raoul's account of the adventures he met with on his journey and the details of the battle.

Listening to the relation of those emotions so fresh and pure, the fine, noble face of Athos betrayed indescribable pleasure; he inhaled the tones of that young voice, as harmonious music. He forgot all that was dark in the past and that was cloudy in the future. It almost seemed as if the return of this much loved boy had changed his fears to hopes. Athos was happy—happy as he had never been before.

'And you assisted and took part in this great battle, Bragelonne!' cried the former musketeer.

'Yes, sir.'

'And it was a fierce one?'

'His highness the prince charged eleven times in person.'

'He is a great commander, Bragelonne.'

'He is a hero, sir. I did not lose sight of him for an instant. Oh! how fine it is to be called Condé and to be so worthy of such a name!'

'He was calm and radiant, was he not?'

'As calm as at parade, radiant as at a fête. When we went up to the enemy it was slowly; we were forbidden to draw first and we were marching toward the Spaniards, who were on a height with lowered muskets. When we arrived about thirty paces from them the prince turned around to the soldiers: "Comrades," he said, "you are about to suffer a furious discharge; but after that you will make short work with those fellows.” There was such dead silence that friends and enemies could have heard these words; then raising his sword, “Sound trumpets!” he cried.

‘Well, very good; you will do as much when the opportunity occurs, will you, Raoul?’

‘I know not, sir, but I thought it really very fine and grand!’

‘Were you afraid, Raoul?’ asked the count.

‘Yes, sir,’ replied the young man naïvely; ‘I felt a great chill at my heart, and at the word “fire,” which resounded in Spanish from the enemy’s ranks, I closed my eyes and thought of you.’

‘In honest truth, Raoul?’ said Athos, pressing his hand.

‘Yes, sir; at that instant there was such a rataplan of musketry that one might have imagined the infernal regions had opened. Those who were not killed felt the heat of the flames. I opened my eyes, astonished to find myself alive and even unhurt; a third of the squadron were lying on the ground, wounded, dead or dying. At that moment I encountered the eye of the prince. I had but one thought and that was that he was observing me. I spurred on and found myself in the enemy’s ranks.’

‘And the prince was pleased with you?’

‘He told me so, at least, sir, when he desired me to return to Paris with Monsieur de Châtillon, who was charged to carry the news to the queen and to bring the colours we had taken. “Go,” said he; “the enemy will not rally for fifteen days and until that time I have no need of your service. Go and see those whom you love and who love you, and tell my sister De Longueville that I thank her for the present that she made me of you.” And I came, sir,’ added Raoul, gazing at the count with a smile of real affection, ‘for I thought you would be glad to see me again.’

Athos drew the young man toward him and pressed his lips to his brow, as he would have done to a young daughter.

‘And now, Raoul,’ said he, ‘you are launched; you have dukes for friends, a marshal of France for godfather, a prince of the blood as commander, and on the day of your return you have been received by two queens; it is not so bad for a novice.’

‘Oh sir,’ said Raoul, suddenly, ‘you recall something, which, in my haste to relate my exploits, I had forgotten; it is that there was with Her Majesty the

Chapter XXXIX

How, Sometimes, the Unhappy Mistake Chance for Providence

‘WELL, madame,’ said De Winter, when the queen had dismissed her attendants.

‘Well, my lord, what I foresaw has come to pass.’

‘What? does the cardinal refuse to receive the king? France refuse hospitality to an unfortunate prince? Ay, but it is for the first time, madame!’

‘I did not say France, my lord; I said the cardinal, and the cardinal is not even a Frenchman.’

‘But did you see the queen?’

‘It is useless,’ replied Henrietta, ‘the queen will not say yes when the cardinal says no. Are you not aware that this Italian directs everything, both indoors and out? And moreover, I should not be surprised had we been forestalled by Cromwell. He was embarrassed whilst speaking to me and yet quite firm in his determination to refuse. Then did you not observe the agitation in the Palais Royal, the passing to and fro of busy people? Can they have received any news, my lord?’

‘Not from England, madame. I made such haste that I am certain of not having been forestalled. I set out three days ago, passing miraculously through the Puritan army, and I took post horses with my servant Tony; the horses upon which we were mounted were bought in Paris. Besides, the king, I am certain, awaits your majesty’s reply before risking anything.’

‘You will tell him, my lord,’ resumed the queen, despairingly, ‘that I can do nothing; that I have suffered as much as himself—more than he has—obliged her daughter to attend her at the palace, which she had inhabited for a long time and which she had only left because their poverty seemed to them more difficult to bear in gilded chambers.

Mordaunt followed the carriage, and when he had watched it drive beneath the sombre arches he went and stationed himself under a wall over which the shadow was extended, and remained motionless, amidst the mouldings of Jean Goujon, like a bas-relievo, representing an equestrian statue.

Queen of England, a gentleman who, when I pronounced your name, uttered a cry of surprise and joy; he said he was a friend of yours, asked your address, and is coming to see you.'

'What is his name?'

'I did not venture to ask, sir; he spoke elegantly, although I thought from his accent he was an Englishman.'

'Ah!' said Athos, leaning down his head as if to remember who it could be. Then, when he raised it again, he was struck by the presence of a man who was standing at the open door and was gazing at him with a compassionate air.

'Lord de Winter?' exclaimed the count.

'Athos, my friend!'

And the two gentlemen were for an instant locked in each other's arms; then Athos, looking into his friend's face and taking him by both hands, said:

'What ails you, my lord? you appear as unhappy as I am the reverse.'

'Yes, truly, dear friend; and I may even say the sight of you increases my dismay.'

And De Winter glancing around him, Raoul quickly understood that the two friends wished to be alone and he therefore left the room unaffectedly.

'Come, now that we are alone,' said Athos, 'let us talk of yourself.'

'Whilst we are alone let us speak of ourselves,' replied De Winter. 'He is here.'

'Who?'

'Milady's son.'

Athos, again struck by this name, which seemed to pursue him like an echo, hesitated for a moment, then slightly knitting his brows, he calmly said:

'I know it, Grimaud met him between Béthune and Arras and then came here to warn me of his presence.'

'Does Grimaud know him, then?'

'No; but he was present at the deathbed of a man who knew him.'

'The headsmen of Béthune?' exclaimed De Winter.

'You know about that?' cried Athos, astonished.

'He has just left me,' replied De Winter, 'after telling me all. Ah! my friend! what a horrible scene! Why did we not destroy the child with the mother?'

'What need you fear?' said Athos, recovering from the instinctive fear he had at first experienced, by the aid of reason; 'are we not men accustomed to defend ourselves? Is this young man an assassin by profession—a murderer in cold blood? He has killed the executioner of Béthune in an access of passion, but now his fury is assuaged.’

De Winter smiled sorrowfully and shook his head.

‘Do you not know the race?’ said he.

‘Pooh!’ said Athos, trying to smile in his turn. ‘It must have lost its ferocity in the second generation. Besides, my friend, Providence has warned us, that we may be on our guard. All we can now do is to wait. Let us wait; and, as I said before, let us speak of yourself. What brings you to Paris?’

‘Affairs of importance which you shall know later. But what is this that I hear from Her Majesty the Queen of England? Monsieur d’Artagnan sides with Mazarin! Pardon my frankness, dear friend. I neither hate nor blame the cardinal, and your opinions will be held ever sacred by me. But do you happen to belong to him?’

‘Monsieur d’Artagnan,’ replied Athos, ‘is in the service; he is a soldier and obeys all constitutional authority. Monsieur d’Artagnan is not rich and has need of his position as lieutenant to enable him to live. Millionaires like yourself, my lord, are rare in France.’

‘Alas!’ said De Winter, ‘I am at this moment as poor as he is, if not poorer. But to return to our subject.’

‘Well, then, you wish to know if I am of Mazarin’s party? No. Pardon my frankness, too, my lord.’

‘I am obliged to you, count, for this pleasing intelligence! You make me young and happy again by it. Ah! so you are not a Mazarinist? Delightful! Indeed, you could not belong to him. But pardon me, are you free? I mean to ask if you are married?’

‘Ah! as to that, no,’ replied Athos, laughing.

‘Because that young man, so handsome, so elegant, so polished—’

‘Is a child I have adopted and who does not even know who was his father.’

‘Very well; you are always the same, Athos, great and generous. Are you still friends with Monsieur Porthos and Monsieur Aramis?’

‘Add Monsieur d’Artagnan, my lord. We still remain four friends devoted to each other; but when it becomes a question of serving the cardinal or of fighting him, of being Mazarinists or Frondistes, then we are only two.’

‘Is Monsieur Aramis with D’Artagnan?’ asked Lord de Winter.

‘See if the young man with the black doublet and the short hair, who was with me just now, is still in the palace.’

Bernouin went out and soon returned with Comminges, who was on guard. ‘Your eminence,’ said Comminges, ‘as I was re-conducting the young man for whom you have asked, he approached the glass door of the gallery, and gazed intently upon some object, doubtless the picture by Raphael, which is opposite the door. He reflected for a second and then descended the stairs. I believe I saw him mount a gray horse and leave the palace court. But is not your eminence going to the queen?’

‘For what purpose?’

‘Monsieur de Guittant, my uncle, has just told me that her majesty had received news of the army.’

‘It is well; I will go.’

Comminges had seen rightly, and Mordaunt had really acted as he had related. In crossing the gallery parallel to the large glass gallery, he perceived De Winter, who was waiting until the queen had finished her negotiation.

At this sight the young man stopped short, not in admiration of Raphael’s picture, but as if fascinated at the sight of some terrible object. His eyes dilated and a shudder ran through his body. One would have said that he longed to break through the wall of glass which separated him from his enemy; for if Comminges had seen with what an expression of hatred the eyes of this young man were fixed upon De Winter, he would not have doubted for an instant that the Englishman was his eternal foe.

But he stopped, doubtless to reflect; for instead of allowing his first impulse, which had been to go straight to Lord de Winter, to carry him away, he leisurely descended the staircase, left the palace with his head down, mounted his horse, which he reined in at the corner of the Rue Richelieu, and with his eyes fixed on the gate, waited until the queen’s carriage had left the court.

He had not long to wait, for the queen scarcely remained a quarter of an hour with Mazarin, but this quarter of an hour of expectation appeared a century to him. At last the heavy machine, which was called a chariot in those days, came out, rumbling against the gates, and De Winter, still on horseback, bent again to the door to converse with her majesty.

The horses started on a trot and took the road to the Louvre, which they entered. Before leaving the convent of the Carmelites, Henrietta had desired