

'No; you are right, my dear Rochefort, it couldn't be for that; but you will probably learn the reason soon.'

'Ah, indeed! I forgot to ask you—where are you taking me?'

'To the cardinal.'

'What does he want with me?'

'I do not know. I did not even know that you were the person I was sent to fetch.'

'Impossible—you—a favourite of the minister!'

'A favourite! no, indeed!' cried D'Artagnan. 'Ah, my poor friend! I am just as poor a Gascon as when I saw you at Meung, twenty-two years ago, you know; alas!' and he concluded his speech with a deep sigh.

'Nevertheless, you come as one in authority.'

'Because I happened to be in the ante-chamber when the cardinal called me, by the merest chance. I am still a lieutenant in the musketeers and have been so these twenty years.'

'Then no misfortune has happened to you?'

'And what misfortune could happen to me? To quote some Latin verses I have forgotten, or rather, never knew well, "the thunderbolt never falls on the valleys," and I am a valley, dear Rochefort,—one of the lowliest of the low.'

'Then Mazarin is still Mazarin?'

'The same as ever, my friend, it is said that he is married to the queen.'

'Married?'

'If not her husband, he is unquestionably her lover.'

'You surprise me. Rebuff Buckingham and consent to Mazarin!'

'Just like the women,' replied D'Artagnan, coolly.

'Like women, not like queens.'

'Egad! queens are the weakest of their sex, when it comes to such things as these.'

'And M. de Beaufort—is he still in prison?'

'Yes. Why?'

'Oh, nothing, but that he might get me out of this, if he were favourably inclined to me.'

'You are probably nearer freedom than he is, so it will be your business to get him out.'

'And,' said the prisoner, 'what talk is there of war with Spain?'

'With Spain, no,' answered D'Artagnan; 'but Paris.'

'What do you mean?' cried Rochefort.

'Do you hear the guns, pray? The citizens are amusing themselves in the meantime.'

'And you—do you really think that anything could be done with these bourgeois?'

'Yes, they might do well if they had any leader to unite them in one body.'

'How miserable not to be free!'

'Don't be downcast. Since Mazarin has sent for you, it is because he wants you. I congratulate you! Many a long year has passed since any one has wanted to employ me; so you see in what a situation I am.'

'Make your complaints known; that's my advice.'

'Listen, Rochefort; let us make a compact. We are friends, are we not?'

'Egad! I bear the traces of our friendship—three slits or slashes from your sword.'

'Well, if you should be restored to favour, don't forget me.'

'On the honour of a Rochefort; but you must do the like for me.'

'There's my hand,—I promise.'

'Therefore, whenever you find any opportunity of saying something in my behalf—'

'I shall say it, and you?'

'I shall do the same.'

'Apropos, are we to speak of your friends also, Athos, Porthos, and Aramis? or have you forgotten them?'

'Almost.'

'What has become of them?'

'I don't know; we separated, as you know. They are alive, that's all that I can say about them; from time to time I hear of them indirectly, but in what part of the world they are, devil take me if I know. No, on my honour, I have not a friend in the world but you, Rochefort.'

'And the illustrious—what's the name of the lad whom I made a sergeant in Piedmont's regiment?'

'Planchet!'

'The illustrious Planchet. What has become of him?'

'I shouldn't wonder if he were at the head of the mob at this very moment. He married a woman who keeps a confectioner's shop in the Rue des Lombards, for he's a lad who was always fond of sweetmeats; he's now a citizen of Paris. You'll see that that queer fellow will be a sheriff before I shall be a captain.'

'Come, dear D'Artagnan, look up a little! Courage! It is when one is lowest on the wheel of fortune that the merry-go-round wheels and rewards us. This evening your destiny begins to change.'

'Amen!' exclaimed D'Artagnan, stopping the carriage.

'What are you doing?' asked Rochefort.

'We are almost there and I want no one to see me getting out of your carriage; we are supposed not to know each other.'

'You are right. Adieu.'

'Au revoir. Remember your promise.'

In five minutes the party entered the courtyard and D'Artagnan led the prisoner up the great staircase and across the corridor and ante-chamber.

As they stopped at the door of the cardinal's study, D'Artagnan was about to be announced when Rochefort slapped him on his shoulder.

'D'Artagnan, let me confess to you what I've been thinking about during the whole of my drive, as I looked out upon the parties of citizens who perpetually crossed our path and looked at you and your four men with fiery eyes.'

'Speak out,' answered D'Artagnan.

'I had only to cry out "Help!" for you and for your companions to be cut to pieces, and then I should have been free.'

'Why didn't you do it?' asked the lieutenant.

'Come, come!' cried Rochefort. 'Did we not swear friendship? Ah! had any one but you been there, I don't say—'

D'Artagnan bowed. 'Is it possible that Rochefort has become a better man than I am?' he said to himself. And he caused himself to be announced to the minister.

'Let M. de Rochefort enter,' said Mazarin, eagerly, on hearing their names pronounced; 'and beg M. d'Artagnan to wait; I shall have further need of him.'

These words gave great joy to D'Artagnan. As he had said, it had been a long time since any one had needed him; and that demand for his services on the part of Mazarin seemed to him an auspicious sign.

'Well, then, I don't know.'

'Have you any suspicion of me, Rochefort?'

'No! on the honour of a gentleman; but I cannot be imprisoned for the reason alleged; it is impossible.'

'What reason?' asked D'Artagnan.

'For stealing.'

'For stealing! you, Rochefort! you are laughing at me.'

'I understand. You mean that this demands explanation, do you not?'

'I admit it.'

'Well, this is what actually took place: One evening after an orgy in Reinard's apartment at the Tuileries with the Duc d'Harcourt, Fontailles, De Rieux and others, the Duc d'Harcourt proposed that we should go and pull cloaks on the Pont Neuf; that is, you know, a diversion which the Duc d'Orléans made quite the fashion.'

'Were you crazy, Rochefort? at your age!'

'No, I was drunk. And yet, since the amusement seemed to me rather tame, I proposed to Chevalier de Rieux that we should be spectators instead of actors, and, in order to see to advantage, that we should mount the bronze horse. No sooner said than done. Thanks to the spurs, which served as stirrups, in a moment we were perched upon the croupe; we were well placed and saw everything. Four or five cloaks had already been lifted, with a dexterity without parallel, and not one of the victims had dared to say a word, when some fool of a fellow, less patient than the others, took it into his head to cry out, "Guard!" and drew upon us a patrol of archers. Duc d'Harcourt, Fontailles, and the others escaped; De Rieux was inclined to do likewise, but I told him they wouldn't look for us where we were. He wouldn't listen, put his foot on the spur to get down, the spur broke, he fell with a broken leg, and, instead of keeping quiet, took to crying out like a gallows-bird. I then was ready to dismount, but it was too late; I descended into the arms of the archers. They conducted me to the Châtelet, where I slept soundly, being very sure that on the next day I should go forth free. The next day came and passed, the day after, a week; I then wrote to the cardinal. The same day they came for me and took me to the Bastille. That was five years ago. Do you believe it was because I committed the sacrilege of mounting en croupe behind Henry IV?'

The unhappy wretch who entered the Bastille ceased, as he crossed the threshold, to be a man—he became a number.

D'Artagnan shuddered at the noise of the keys; he remained on horseback, feeling no inclination to dismount, and sat looking at the bars, at the buttressed windows and the immense walls he had hitherto only seen from the other side of the moat, but by which he had for twenty years been awe-struck.

A bell resounded.

'I must leave you,' said Du Tremblay; 'I am sent for to sign the release of a prisoner. I shall be happy to meet you again, sir.'

'May the devil annihilate me if I return thy wish!' murmured D'Artagnan, smiling as he pronounced the imprecation; 'I declare I feel quite ill after only being five minutes in the courtyard. Go to! go to! I would rather die on straw than hoard up a thousand a year by being governor of the Bastille.'

He had scarcely finished this soliloquy before the prisoner arrived. On seeing him D'Artagnan could hardly suppress an exclamation of surprise. The prisoner got into the carriage without seeming to recognise the musketeer.

'Gentlemen,' thus D'Artagnan addressed the four musketeers, 'I am ordered to exercise the greatest possible care in guarding the prisoner, and since there are no locks to the carriage, I shall sit beside him. Monsieur de Lillebonne, lead my horse by the bridle, if you please.' As he spoke he dismounted, gave the bridle of his horse to the musketeer and placing himself by the side of the prisoner said, in a voice perfectly composed, 'To the Palais Royal, at full trot.' The carriage drove on and D'Artagnan, availing himself of the darkness in the archway under which they were passing, threw himself into the arms of the prisoner.

'Rochefort!' he exclaimed; 'you! is it you, indeed? I am not mistaken?'

'D'Artagnan!' cried Rochefort.

'Ah! my poor friend!' resumed D'Artagnan, 'not having seen you for four or five years I concluded you were dead.'

'Faith,' said Rochefort, 'there's no great difference, I think, between a dead man and one who has been buried alive; now I have been buried alive, or very nearly so.'

'And for what crime are you imprisoned in the Bastille?'

'Do you wish me to speak the truth?'

'Yes.'

Rochefort, rendered suspicious and cautious by these words, entered the apartment, where he found Mazarin sitting at the table, dressed in his ordinary garb and as one of the prelates of the Church, his costume being similar to that of the abbés in that day, excepting that his scarf and stockings were violet. As the door was closed Rochefort cast a glance toward Mazarin, which was answered by one, equally furtive, from the minister.

There was little change in the cardinal; still dressed with sedulous care, his hair well arranged and curled, his person perfumed, he looked, owing to his extreme taste in dress, only half his age. But Rochefort, who had passed five years in prison, had become old in the lapse of a few years; the dark locks of this estimable friend of the defunct Cardinal Richelieu were now white; the deep bronze of his complexion had been succeeded by a morbid pallor which betokened debility. As he gazed at him Mazarin shook his head slightly, as much as to say, 'This is a man who does not appear to me fit for much.'

After a pause, which appeared an age to Rochefort, Mazarin took from a bundle of papers a letter, and showing it to the count, he said:

'I find here a letter in which you sue for liberty, Monsieur de Rochefort. You are in prison, then?'

Rochefort trembled in every limb at this question. 'But I thought,' he said, 'that your eminence knew that circumstance better than any one—'

'? Oh no! There is a congestion of prisoners in the Bastille, who were cooped up in the time of Monsieur de Richelieu; I don't even know their names.'

'Yes, but in regard to myself, my lord, it cannot be so, for I was removed from the Châtelet to the Bastille owing to an order from your eminence.'

'You think you were.'

'I am certain of it.'

'Ah, stay! I fancy I remember it. Did you not once refuse to undertake a journey to Brussels for the queen?'

'Ah! ah!' exclaimed Rochefort. 'There is the true reason! Idiot that I am, though I have been trying to find it out for five years, I never found it out.'

'But I do not say it was the cause of your imprisonment. I merely ask you, did you not refuse to go to Brussels for the queen, whilst you had consented to go there to do some service for the late cardinal?'

‘That is the very reason I refused to go back to Brussels. I was there at a fearful moment. I was sent there to intercept a correspondence between Chalais and the archduke, and even then, when I was discovered I was nearly torn to pieces. How could I, then, return to Brussels? I should injure the queen instead of serving her.’

‘Well, since the best motives are liable to misconstruction, the queen saw in your refusal nothing but a refusal—a distinct refusal she had also much to complain of you during the lifetime of the late cardinal; yes, her majesty the queen—’

Rochefort smiled contemptuously.

‘Since I was a faithful servant, my lord, to Cardinal Richelieu during his life, it stands to reason that now, after his death, I should serve you well, in defiance of the whole world.’

‘With regard to myself, Monsieur de Rochefort,’ replied Mazarin, ‘I am not, like Monsieur de Richelieu, all-powerful. I am but a minister, who wants no servants, being myself nothing but a servant of the queen’s. Now, the queen is of a sensitive nature. Hearing of your refusal to obey her she looked upon it as a declaration of war, and as she considers you a man of superior talent, and consequently dangerous, she desired me to make sure of you; that is the reason of your being shut up in the Bastille. But your release can be managed. You are one of those men who can comprehend certain matters and having understood them, can act with energy—’

‘Such was Cardinal Richelieu’s opinion, my lord.’

‘The cardinal,’ interrupted Mazarin, ‘was a great politician and therein shone his vast superiority over me. I am a straightforward, simple man; that’s my great disadvantage. I am of a frankness of character quite French.’

Rochefort bit his lips in order to prevent a smile.

‘Now to the point. I want friends; I want faithful servants. When I say I want, I mean the queen wants them. I do nothing without her commands—pray understand that; not like Monsieur de Richelieu, who went on just as he pleased. So I shall never be a great man, as he was, but to compensate for that, I shall be a good man, Monsieur de Rochefort, and I hope to prove it to you.’

Rochefort knew well the tones of that soft voice, in which sounded sometimes a sort of gentle hiss, like the hissing of young vipers.

Chapter III

Dead Animosities

ARTAGNAN arrived at the Bastille just as it was striking half-past eight. His visit was announced to the governor, who, on hearing that he came from the cardinal, went to meet him and received him at the top of the great flight of steps outside the door. The governor of the Bastille was Monsieur du Tremblay, the brother of the famous Capuchin, Joseph, that fearful favourite of Richelieu’s, who went by the name of the Gray Cardinal.

During the period that the Duc de Bassompierre passed in the Bastille—where he remained for twelve long years—when his companions, in their dreams of liberty, said to each other: ‘As for me, I shall go out of the prison at such a time,’ and another, at such and such a time, the duke used to answer, ‘As for me, gentlemen, I shall leave only when Monsieur du Tremblay leaves,’ meaning that at the death of the cardinal Du Tremblay would certainly lose his place at the Bastille and De Bassompierre regain his at court.

His prediction was nearly fulfilled, but in a very different way from that which De Bassompierre supposed; for after the death of Richelieu everything went on, contrary to expectation, in the same way as before; and Bassompierre had little chance of leaving his prison.

Monsieur du Tremblay received D’Artagnan with extreme politeness and invited him to sit down with him to supper, of which he was himself about to partake.

‘I should be delighted to do so,’ was the reply; ‘but if I am not mistaken, the words “In haste,” are written on the envelope of the letter which I brought.’

‘You are right,’ said Du Tremblay. ‘Halloo, major! tell them to order Number 25 to come downstairs.’

‘I am disposed to believe your eminence,’ he replied; ‘though I have had but little evidence of that good-nature of which your eminence speaks. Do not forget that I have been five years in the Bastille and that no medium of viewing things is so deceptive as the grating of a prison.’

‘Ah, Monsieur de Rochefort! have I not told you already that I had nothing to do with that? The queen—cannot you make allowances for the pettishness of a queen and a princess? But that has passed away as suddenly as it came, and is forgotten.’

‘I can easily suppose, sir, that her majesty has forgotten it amid the fêtes and the courtiers of the Palais Royal, but I who have passed those years in the Bastille—’

‘Ah! mon Dieu! my dear Monsieur de Rochefort! do you absolutely think that the Palais Royal is the abode of gavery? No. We have had great annoyances there. As for me, I play my game squarely, fairly, and above board, as I always do. Let us come to some conclusion. Are you one of us, Monsieur de Rochefort?’

‘I am very desirous of being so, my lord, but I am totally in the dark about everything. In the Bastille one talks politics only with soldiers and jailers, and you have not an idea, my lord, how little is known of what is going on by people of that sort; I am of Monsieur de Bassompierre’s party. Is he still one of the seventeen peers of France?’

‘He is dead, sir; a great loss. His devotion to the queen was boundless; men of loyalty are scarce.’

‘I think so, forsooth,’ said Rochefort, ‘and when you find any of them, you march them off to the Bastille. However, there are plenty in the world, but you don’t look in the right direction for them, my lord.’

‘Indeed! explain to me. Ah! my dear Monsieur de Rochefort, how much you must have learned during your intimacy with the late cardinal! Ah! he was a great man.’

‘Will your eminence be angry if I read you a lesson?’

‘I never! you know you may say anything to me. I try to be beloved, not feared.’

‘Well, there is on the wall of my cell, scratched with a nail, a proverb, which says, “Like master, like servant.”’

‘Pray, what does that mean?’

'It means that Monsieur de Richelieu was able to find trusty servants, dozens and dozens of them.'

'He! the point aimed at by every poniard! Richelieu, who passed his life in warding off blows which were forever aimed at him!'

'But he did ward them off,' said De Rochefort, 'and the reason was, that though he had bitter enemies he possessed also true friends. I have known persons,' he continued—for he thought he might avail himself of the opportunity of speaking of D'Arragnan—'who by their sagacity and address have deceived the penetration of Cardinal Richelieu; who by their valour have got the better of his guards and spies; persons without money, without support, without credit, yet who have preserved to the crowned head its crown and made the cardinal crave pardon.'

'But those men you speak of,' said Mazarin, smiling inwardly on seeing Rochefort approach the point to which he was leading him, 'those men were not devoted to the cardinal, for they contended against him.'

'No; in that case they would have met with more fitting reward. They had the misfortune to be devoted to that very queen for whom just now you were seeking servants.'

'But how is it that you know so much of these matters?'

'I know them because the men of whom I speak were at that time my enemies; because they fought against me; because I did them all the harm I could and they returned it to the best of their ability; because one of them, with whom I had most to do, gave me a pretty sword-thrust, now about seven years ago, the third that I received from the same hand; it closed an old account.'

'Ah!' said Mazarin, with admirable suavity, 'could I but find such men!'

'My lord, there has stood for six years at your very door a man such as I describe, and during those six years he has been unappreciated and unemployed by you.'

'Who is it?'

'It is Monsieur d'Arragnan.'

'That Gascon!' cried Mazarin, with well acted surprise.

'"That Gascon" has saved a queen and made Monsieur de Richelieu confess that in point of talent, address and political skill, to him he was only a tyro.'

'Really?'

'It is as I have the honour of telling it to your excellency.'

'Monsieur d'Arragnan,' he said, 'you are to take this dispatch to the Bastille and bring back here the person it concerns. You must take a carriage and an escort, and guard the prisoner with the greatest care.'

D'Arragnan took the letter, touched his hat with his hand, turned round upon his heel like a drill-sergeant, and a moment afterward was heard, in his dry and monotonous tone, commanding 'Four men and an escort, a carriage and a horse.' Five minutes afterward the wheels of the carriage and the horses' shoes were heard resounding on the pavement of the courtyard.

‘Does my lord seriously wish me to name any one who was mixed up in the cabals of that day?’

‘By Bacchus!’ rejoined Mazarin, impatiently, ‘it’s about an hour since I asked you for that very thing, wooden-head that you are.’

‘There is one man for whom I can answer, if he will speak out.’

‘That’s my concern; I will make him speak.’

‘Ah, my lord, ’tis not easy to make people say what they don’t wish to let out.’

‘Pooh! with patience one must succeed. Well, this man. Who is he?’

‘The Comte de Rochefort.’

‘The Comte de Rochefort!’

‘Unfortunately he has disappeared these four or five years and I don’t know where he is.’

‘I know, Guitant,’ said Mazarin.

‘Well, then, how is it that your eminence complained just now of want of information?’

‘You think,’ resumed Mazarin, ‘that Rochefort—’

‘He was Cardinal Richelieu’s creature, my lord. I warn you, however, his services will cost you something. The cardinal was lavish to his underlings.’

‘Yes, yes, Guitant,’ said Mazarin; ‘Richelieu was a great man, a very great man, but he had that defect. Thanks, Guitant; I shall benefit by your advice this very evening.’

Here they separated and bidding adieu to Guitant in the court of the Palais Royal, Mazarin approached an officer who was walking up and down within that inclosure.

It was D’Arragnan, who was waiting for him.

‘Come hither,’ said Mazarin in his softest voice; ‘I have an order to give you.’

D’Arragnan bent low and following the cardinal up the secret staircase, soon found himself in the study whence they had first set out.

The cardinal seated himself before his bureau and taking a sheet of paper wrote some lines upon it, whilst D’Arragnan stood imperturbable, without showing either impatience or curiosity. He was like a soldierly automaton, or rather, like a magnificent marionette.

The cardinal folded and sealed his letter.

‘Tell me a little about it, my dear Monsieur de Rochefort.’

‘That is somewhat difficult, my lord,’ said Rochefort, with a smile.

‘Then he will tell it me himself.’

‘I doubt it, my lord.’

‘Why do you doubt it?’

‘Because the secret does not belong to him; because, as I have told you, it has to do with a great queen.’

‘And he was alone in achieving an enterprise like that?’

‘No, my lord, he had three colleagues, three brave men, men such as you were wishing for just now.’

‘And were these four men attached to each other, true in heart, really united?’

‘As if they had been one man—as if their four hearts had pulsed in one breast.’

‘You pique my curiosity, dear Rochefort; pray tell me the whole story.’

‘That is impossible; but I will tell you a true story, my lord.’

‘Pray do so, I delight in stories,’ cried the cardinal.

‘Listen, then,’ returned Rochefort, as he spoke endeavouring to read in that subtle countenance the cardinal’s motive. ‘Once upon a time there lived a queen—a powerful monarch—who reigned over one of the greatest kingdoms of the universe; and a minister; and this minister wished much to injure the queen, whom once he had loved too well. (Do not try, my lord, you cannot guess who it is; all this happened long before you came into the country where this queen reigned.) There came to the court an ambassador so brave, so magnificent, so elegant, that every woman lost her heart to him; and the queen had even the indiscretion to give him certain ornaments so rare that they could never be replaced by any like them.

As these ornaments were given by the king the minister persuaded his majesty to insist upon the queen’s appearing in them as part of her jewels at a ball which was soon to take place. There is no occasion to tell you, my lord, that the minister knew for a fact that these ornaments had sailed away with the ambassador, who was far away, beyond seas. This illustrious queen had fallen low as the least of her subjects—fallen from her high estate.’

‘Indeed!’

'Well, my lord, four men resolved to save her. These four men were not princes, neither were they dukes, neither were they men in power; they were not even rich. They were four honest soldiers, each with a good heart, a good arm and a sword at the service of those who wanted it. They set out. The minister knew of their departure and had planted people on the road to prevent them ever reaching their destination. Three of them were overwhelmed and disabled by numerous assailants; one of them alone arrived at the port, having either killed or wounded those who wished to stop him. He crossed the sea and brought back the set of ornaments to the great queen, who was able to wear them on her shoulder on the appointed day; and this very nearly ruined the minister. What do you think of that exploit, my lord?'

'It is magnificent!' said Mazarin, thoughtfully.

'Well, I know of ten such men.'

Mazarin made no reply; he reflected.

Five or six minutes elapsed.

'You have nothing more to ask of me, my lord?' said Rochefort.

'Yes. And you say that Monsieur d'Aragnan was one of those four men?'

'He led the enterprise.'

'And who were the others?'

'I leave it to Monsieur d'Aragnan to name them, my lord. They were his friends and not mine. He alone would have any influence with them; I do not even know them under their true names.'

'You suspect me, Monsieur de Rochefort; I want him and you and all to aid me.'

'Begin with me, my lord; for after five or six years of imprisonment it is natural to feel some curiosity as to one's destination.'

'You, my dear Monsieur de Rochefort, shall have the post of confidence; you shall go to Vincennes, where Monsieur de Beaufort is confined; you will guard him well for me. Well, what is the matter?'

'The matter is that you have proposed to me what is impossible,' said Rochefort, shaking his head with an air of disappointment.

'What! impossible? And why is it impossible?'

'Because Monsieur de Beaufort is one of my friends, or rather, I am one of his. Have you forgotten, my lord, that it is he who answered for me to the queen?'

'You have found that out, have you, my lord? Deuce take it—all the worse for me!'

'How?'

'There is no doubt but that one of the chief accomplishments of a courtier is to know when to forget.'

'But you, Guitant, are not a courtier. You are a brave soldier, one of the few remaining veterans of the days of Henry IV. Alas! how few to-day exist!'

'Plague on 't, my lord, have you brought me here to get my horoscope out of me?'

'No; I only brought you here to ask you,' returned Mazarin, smiling, 'if you have taken any particular notice of our lieutenant of musketeers?'

'Monsieur d'Aragnan? I have had no occasion to notice him particularly; he's an old acquaintance. He's a Gascon. De Tréville knows him and esteems him very highly; and De Tréville, as you know, is one of the queen's greatest friends. As a soldier the man ranks well; he did his whole duty and even more, at the siege of Rochelle—as at Suze and Perpignan.'

'But you know, Guitant, we poor ministers often want men with other qualities besides courage; we want men of talent. Pray, was not Monsieur d'Aragnan, in the time of the cardinal, mixed up in some intrigue from which he came out, according to report, quite cleverly?'

'My lord, as to the report you allude to'—Guitant perceived that the cardinal wished to make him speak out—'I know nothing but what the public knows. I never meddle in intrigues, and if I occasionally become a confidant of the intrigues of others I am sure your eminence will approve of my keeping them secret.'

Mazarin shook his head.

'Ah!' he said; 'some ministers are fortunate and find out all that they wish to know.'

'My lord,' replied Guitant, 'such ministers do not weigh men in the same balance; they get their information on war from warriors; on intrigues, from intriguers. Consult some politician of the period of which you speak, and if you pay well for it you will certainly get to know all you want.'

'Eh, pardieu!' said Mazarin, with a grimace which he always made when spoken to about money. 'They will be paid, if there is no way of getting out of it.'

queen; and then Anne of Austria had so often deserted her friends that her support seemed most precarious. During the whole of this nocturnal ride, during the whole time that he was endeavouring to understand the various characters of Comminges, Guitant and Villequier, Mazarin was, in truth, studying more especially one man. This man, who had remained immovable as bronze when menaced by the mob—not a muscle of whose face was stirred, either at Mazarin's witticisms or by the jests of the multitude—seemed to the cardinal a peculiar being, who, having participated in past events similar to those now occurring, was calculated to cope with those now on the eve of taking place.

The name of D'Artagnan was not altogether new to Mazarin, who, although he did not arrive in France before the year 1634 or 1635, that is to say, about eight or nine years after the events which we have related in a preceding narrative¹, fancied he had heard it pronounced as that of one who was said to be a model of courage, address and loyalty.

Possessed by this idea, the cardinal resolved to know all about D'Artagnan immediately; of course he could not inquire from D'Artagnan himself who he was and what had been his career; he remarked, however, in the course of conversation that the lieutenant of musketeers spoke with a Gascon accent. Now the Italians and the Gascons are too much alike and know each other too well ever to trust what any one of them may say of himself; so in reaching the walls which surrounded the Palais Royal, the cardinal knocked at a little door, and after thanking D'Artagnan and requesting him to wait in the court of the Palais Royal, he made a sign to Guitant to follow him.

They both dismounted, consigned their horses to the lackey who had opened the door, and disappeared in the garden.

'My dear friend,' said the cardinal, leaning, as they walked through the garden, on his friend's arm, 'you told me just now that you had been twenty years in the queen's service.'

'Yes, it's true. I have,' returned Guitant.

'Now, my dear Guitant, I have often remarked that in addition to your courage, which is indisputable, and your fidelity, which is invincible, you possess an admirable memory.'

¹ The Three Musketeers

'Since then Monsieur de Beaufort has become an enemy of the State.'
'That may be, my lord; but since I am neither king nor queen nor minister, he is not my enemy and I cannot accept your offer.'

'This, then, is what you call devotion! I congratulate you. Your devotion does not commit you too far, Monsieur de Rochefort.'

'And then, my lord,' continued Rochefort, 'you understand that to emerge from the Bastille in order to enter Vincennes is only to change one's prison.'

'Say at once that you are on the side of Monsieur de Beaufort; that will be the most sincere line of conduct,' said Mazarin.

'My lord, I have been so long shut up, that I am only of one party—I am for fresh air. Employ me in any other way; employ me even actively; but let it be on the high roads.'

'My dear Monsieur de Rochefort,' Mazarin replied in a tone of rally, 'you think yourself still a young man; your spirit is that of the phoenix, but your strength fails you. Believe me, you ought now to take a rest. Here!'

'You decide, then, nothing about me, my lord?'

'On the contrary, I have come to a decision.'

Bernouin came into the room.

'Call an officer of justice,' he said; 'and stay close to me,' he added, in a low tone.

The officer entered. Mazarin wrote a few words, which he gave to this man; then he bowed.

'Adieu, Monsieur de Rochefort,' he said.

Rochefort bent low.

'I see, my lord, I am to be taken back to the Bastille.'

'You are sagacious.'

'I shall return thither, my lord, but it is a mistake on your part not to employ me.'

'You? the friend of my greatest foes? Don't suppose that you are the only person who can serve me, Monsieur de Rochefort. I shall find many men as able as you are.'

'I wish you may, my lord,' replied De Rochefort.

He was then reconducted by the little staircase, instead of passing through the ante-chamber where D'Artagnan was waiting. In the courtyard the carriage and the four musketeers were ready, but he looked around in vain for his friend.

'Ah!' he muttered to himself, 'this changes the situation, and if there is still a crowd of people in the streets we will try to show Mazarin that we are still, thank God, good for something else than keeping guard over a prisoner;' and he jumped into the carriage with the alacrity of a man of five-and-twenty.

'Yes, but I could give him the order—I, Guitant—and I preferred to give it to you.'

Guitant, without reply, rode forward and desired the sentinel to call Monsieur de Villeguier.

'Ah! so you are here!' cried the officer, in the tone of ill-humor habitual to him; 'what the devil are you doing here?'

'I wish to know—can you tell me, pray—is anything fresh occurring in this part of the town?'

'What do you mean? People cry out, "Long live the king! down with Mazarin!" That's nothing new, no, we've been used to those acclamations for some time.'

'And you sing chorus,' replied Guitant, laughing.

'Faith, I've half a mind to do it. In my opinion the people are right; and cheerfully would I give up five years of my pay—which I am never paid, by the way—to make the king five years older.'

'Really! And pray what would come to pass, supposing the king were five years older than he is?'

'As soon as ever the king comes of age he will issue his commands himself, and 'tis far pleasanter to obey the grandson of Henry IV than the son of Peter Mazarin. 'Sdeath! I would die willingly for the king, but supposing I happened to be killed on account of Mazarin, as your nephew came near being to-day, there could be nothing in Paradise, however well placed I might be there, that could console me for it.'

'Well, well, Monsieur de Villeguier,' Mazarin interposed, 'I shall make it my care the king hears of your loyalty. Come, gentlemen,' addressing the troop, 'let us return.'

'Stop,' exclaimed Villeguier, 'so Mazarin was here! so much the better. I have been waiting for a long time to tell him what I think of him. I am obliged to you Guitant, although your intention was perhaps not very favourable to me, for such an opportunity.'

He turned away and went off to his post, whistling a tune then popular among the party called the 'Fronde,' whilst Mazarin returned, in a pensive mood, toward the Palais Royal. All that he had heard from these three different men, Comminges, Guitant and Villeguier, confirmed him in his conviction that in case of serious tumults there would be no one on his side except the