

‘Well, then, gentlemen,’ said the queen, ‘since it is thus, and since you are willing to devote yourselves to the service of a poor princess whom the whole world has abandoned, this is what is required to be done for me. The king is alone with a few gentlemen, whom he fears to lose every day; surrounded by the Scotch, whom he distrusts, although he be himself a Scotchman. Since Lord de Winter left him I am distracted, sirs. I ask much, too much, perhaps, for I have no title to request it. Go to England, join the king, be his friends, protectors, march to battle at his side, and be near him in his house, where conspiracies, more dangerous than the perils of war, are hatching every day. And in exchange for the sacrifice that you make, gentlemen, I promise—not to reward you, I believe that word would offend you—but to love you as a sister, to prefer you, next to my husband and my children, to every one. I swear it before Heaven.’

And the queen raised her eyes solemnly upward.

‘Madame,’ said Athos, ‘when must we set out?’

‘You consent then?’ exclaimed the queen, joyfully.

‘Yes, madame; only it seems to me that your majesty goes too far in engaging to load us with a friendship so far above our merit. We render service to God, madame, in serving a prince so unfortunate, a queen so virtuous. Madame, we are yours, body and soul.’

‘Oh, sirs,’ said the queen, moved even to tears, ‘this is the first time for five years I have felt the least approach to joy or hope. God, who can read my heart, all the gratitude I feel, will reward you! Save my husband! Save the king, and although you care not for the price that is placed upon a good action in this world, leave me the hope that we shall meet again, when I may be able to thank you myself. In the meantime, I remain here. Have you anything to ask of me? From this moment I become your friend, and since you are engaged in my affairs I ought to occupy myself in yours.’

‘Madame,’ replied Athos, ‘I have only to ask your majesty’s prayers.’

‘And I,’ said Aramis, ‘I am alone in the world and have only your majesty to serve.’

The queen held out her hand, which they kissed, and she said in a low tone to De Winter:

‘If you need money, my lord, separate the jewels I have given you; detach the diamonds and sell them to some Jew. You will receive for them fifty or sixty thousand francs; spend them if necessary, but let these gentlemen be treated as they deserve, that is to say, like kings.’

The queen had two letters ready, one written by herself, the other by her daughter, the Princess Henrietta. Both were addressed to King Charles. She gave the first to Athos and the other to Aramis, so that should they be separated by chance they might make themselves known to the king; after which they withdrew.

At the foot of the staircase De Winter stopped.

‘Not to arouse suspicions, gentlemen,’ said he, ‘go your way and I will go mine, and this evening at nine o’clock we will assemble again at the Gate Saint Denis. We will travel on horseback as far as our horses can go and afterward we can take the post. Once more, let me thank you, my good friends, both in my own name and the queen’s.’

The three gentlemen then shook hands, Lord de Winter taking the Rue Saint Honoré, and Athos and Aramis remaining together.

‘Well,’ said Aramis, when they were alone, ‘what do you think of this business, my dear count?’

‘Bad,’ replied Athos, ‘very bad.’

‘But you received it with enthusiasm.’

‘As I shall ever receive the defence of a great principle, my dear D’Herblay. Monarchs are only strong by the assistance of the aristocracy, but aristocracy cannot survive without the countenance of monarchs. Let us, then, support monarchy, in order to support ourselves.’

‘We shall be murdered there,’ said Aramis. ‘I hate the English—they are coarse, like every nation that swills beer.’

‘Would it be better to remain here,’ said Athos, ‘and take a turn in the Bastille or the dungeon of Vincennes for having favoured the escape of Monsieur de Beaufort? I faith, Aramis, believe me, there is little left to regret. We avoid imprisonment and we play the part of heroes; the choice is easy.’

‘It is true; but in everything, friend, one must always return to the same question—a stupid one, I admit, but very necessary—have you any money?’

‘Something like a hundred pistoles, that my farmer sent to me the day before I left Bragelonne; but out of that sum I ought to leave fifty for Raoul—a young man must live respectably. I have then about fifty pistoles. And you?’

'As for me, I am quite sure that after turning out all my pockets and emptying my drawers I shall not find ten louis at home. Fortunately Lord de Winter is rich.'

'Lord de Winter is ruined for the moment; Oliver Cromwell has annexed his income resources.'

'Now is the time when Baron Porthos would be useful.'

'Now it is that I regret D'Artagnan.'

'Let us entice them away.'

'This secret, Aramis, does not belong to us; take my advice, then, and let no one into our confidence. And moreover, in taking such a step we should appear to be doubtful of ourselves. Let us regret their absence to ourselves for our own sakes, but not speak of it.'

'You are right; but what are you going to do until this evening? I have two things to postpone.'

'And what are they?'

'First, a thrust with the coadjutor, whom I met last night at Madame de Rambouillet's and whom I found particular in his remarks respecting me.'

'Oh, fie—a quarrel between priests, a duel between allies!'

'What can I do, friend? he is a bully and so am I; his cassock is a burden to him and I imagine I have had enough of mine; in fact, there is so much resemblance between us that I sometimes believe he is Aramis and I am the coadjutor. This kind of life fatigues and oppresses me; besides, he is a turbulent fellow, who will ruin our party. I am convinced that if I gave him a box on the ear, such as I gave this morning to the little citizen who splashed me, it would change the appearance of things.'

'And I, my dear Aramis,' quietly replied Athos, 'I think it would only change Monsieur de Retz's appearance. Take my advice, leave things just as they are; besides, you are neither of you now your own masters; he belongs to the Fronde and you to the queen of England. So, if the second matter which you regret being unable to attend to is not more important than the first—'

'Oh! that is of the first importance.'

'Attend to it, then, at once.'

'Unfortunately, it is a thing that I can't perform at any time I choose. It was arranged for the evening and no other time will serve.'

'I understand,' said Athos smiling, 'midnight.'

gentleman is that noble Comte de la Fère, whose high reputation is so well known to your majesty.'

'Gentlemen,' said the queen, 'a few years ago I had around me ushers, treasures, armies; and by the lifting of a finger all these were busied in my service. To-day, look around you, and it may astonish you, that in order to accomplish a plan which is dearer to me than life I have only Lord de Winter, the friend of twenty years, and you, gentlemen, whom I see for the first time and whom I know but as my countrymen.'

'It is enough,' said Athos, bowing low, 'if the lives of three men can purchase yours, madame.'

'I thank you, gentlemen. But hear me,' continued she. 'I am not only the most miserable of queens, but the most unhappy of mothers, the most wretched of wives. My children, two of them, at least, the Duke of York and the Princess Elizabeth, are far away from me, exposed to the blows of the ambitious and our foes; my husband, the king, is leading in England so wretched an existence that it is no exaggeration to aver that he seeks death as a thing to be desired. Hold! gentlemen, here is the letter conveyed to me by Lord de Winter. Read it.'

Obedient the queen, Athos read aloud the letter which we have already seen, in which King Charles demanded to know whether the hospitality of France would be accorded him.

'Well?' asked Athos, when he had closed the letter.

'Well,' said the queen, 'it has been refused.'

The two friends exchanged a smile of contempt.

'And now,' said Athos, 'what is to be done? I have the honour to inquire from your majesty what you desire Monsieur d'Herblay and myself to do in your service. We are ready.'

'Ah, sir, you have a noble heart!' exclaimed the queen, with a burst of gratitude; whilst Lord de Winter turned to her with a glance which said, 'Did I not answer for them?'

'But you, sir?' said the queen to Aramis.

'I, madame,' replied he, 'follow Monsieur de la Fère wherever he leads, even were it on to death, without demanding wherefore; but when it concerns your majesty's service, then,' added he, looking at the queen with all the grace of former days, 'I precede the count.'

to close), no carpets, neither guards nor servants: this is what first met the eyes of Athos, to which he, touching his companion's elbow, directed his attention by his glances.

'Mazarin is better lodged,' said Aramis.

'Mazarin is almost king,' answered Athos; 'Madame Henrietta is almost no longer queen.'

'If you would condescend to be clever, Athos,' observed Aramis, 'I really do think you would be wittier than poor Monsieur de Voiture.'

Athos smiled.

The queen appeared to be impatiently expecting them, for at the first slight noise she heard in the hall leading to her room she came herself to the door to receive these courtiers in the corridors of Misfortune.

'Enter. You are welcome, gentlemen,' she said.

The gentlemen entered and remained standing, but at a motion from the queen they seated themselves. Athos was calm and grave, but Aramis was furious; the sight of such royal misery exasperated him and his eyes examined every new trace of poverty that presented itself.

'You are examining the luxury I enjoy,' said the queen, glancing sadly around her.

'Madame,' replied Aramis, 'I must ask your pardon, but I know not how to hide my indignation at seeing how a daughter of Henry IV is treated at the court of France.'

'Monsieur Aramis is not an officer?' asked the queen of Lord de Winter.

'That gentleman is the Abbé d'Herblay,' replied he.

Aramis blushed. 'Madame,' he said, 'I am an abbé, it is true, but I am so against my will. I never had a vocation for the bands; my cassock is fastened by one button only, and I am always ready to become a musketeer once more. This morning, being ignorant that I should have the honour of seeing your majesty, I encumbered myself with this dress, but you will find me none the less a man devoted to your majesty's service, in whatever way you may see fit to use me.'

'The Abbé d'Herblay,' resumed De Winter, 'is one of those gallant musketeers formerly belonging to His Majesty King Louis XII, of whom I have spoken to you, madame.' Then turning to Athos, he continued, 'And this

'About that time.'

'But, my dear fellow, those are things that bear postponement and you must put it off, especially with so good an excuse to give on your return—'

'Yes, if I return.'

'If you do not return, how does it concern you? Be reasonable. Come, you are no longer twenty years old.'

'To my great regret, mortieu! Ah, if I were but twenty years old!'

'Yes,' said Athos, 'doubtless you would commit great follies! But now we must part. I have one or two visits to make and a letter yet to write. Call for me at eight o'clock or shall I wait supper for you at seven?'

'That will do very well,' said Aramis. 'I have twenty visits to make and as many letters to write.'

They then separated. Athos went to pay a visit to Madame de Vendôme, left his name at Madame de Chevreuse's and wrote the following letter to D'Arragnan:

Dear Friend,

I am about to set off with Aramis on important business. I wished to make my adieux to you, but time does not permit. Remember that I write to you now to repeat how much affection for you I still cherish.

Raoul is gone to Blois and is ignorant of my departure; watch over him in my absence as much as you possibly can; and if by chance you receive no news of me three months hence, tell him to open a packet which he will find addressed to him in my bronze casket at Blois, of which I send you now the key.

Embrace Porthos from Aramis and myself. Adieu, perhaps farewell.

At the hour agreed upon Aramis arrived; he was dressed as an officer and had the old sword at his side which he had drawn so often and which he was more than ever ready to draw.

'By-the-bye,' he said, 'I think that we are decidedly wrong to depart thus, without leaving a line for Porthos and D'Arragnan.'

‘The thing is done, dear friend,’ said Athos; ‘I foresaw that and have embraced them both from you and myself.’

‘You are a wonderful man, my dear count,’ said Aramis; ‘you think of everything.’

‘Well, have you made up your mind to this journey?’

‘Quite; and now that I reflect about it, I am glad to leave Paris at this moment.’

‘And so am I,’ replied Athos; ‘my only regret is not having seen D’Artagnan; but the rascal is so cunning, he might have guessed our project.’

When supper was over Blaisois entered. ‘Sir,’ said he, ‘here is Monsieur d’Artagnan’s answer.’

‘But I did not tell you there would be an answer, stupid!’ said Athos.

‘And I set off without waiting for one, but he called me back and gave me this,’ and he presented a little leather bag, plump and giving out a golden jingle.

Athos opened it and began by drawing forth a little note, written in these terms:

My dear Count,

When one travels, and especially for three months, one never has a superfluity of money. Now, recalling former times of mutual distress, I send you half my purse; it is money to obtain which I made Mazarin sweat. Don’t make a bad use of it, I entreat you.

As to what you say about not seeing you again, I believe not a word of it; with such a heart as yours—and such a sword—one passes through the valley of the shadow of death a dozen times, unscathed and unalarmed. Au revoir, not farewell.

It is unnecessary to say that from the day I saw Raoul I loved him; nevertheless, believe that I heartily pray that I may not become to him a father, however much I might be proud of such a son.

Your

D’ARTAGNAN.

P.S. Be it well understood that the fifty louis which I send are equally for Aramis as for you—for you as Aramis.

‘No, sir.’

At ten o’clock Athos, with his habitual exactitude, was waiting on the Pont du Louvre and was almost immediately joined by Lord de Winter.

They waited ten minutes and then his lordship began to fear Aramis was not coming to join them.

‘Patience,’ said Athos, whose eyes were fixed in the direction of the Rue du Bac, ‘patience; I see an abbé cuffing a man, then bowing to a woman; it must be Aramis.’

It was indeed Aramis. Having run against a young shopkeeper who was gaping at the crows and who had splashed him, Aramis with one blow of his fist had distanced him ten paces.

At this moment one of his penitents passed, and as she was young and pretty Aramis took off his cap to her with his most gracious smile.

A most affectionate greeting, as one can well believe took place between him and Lord de Winter.

‘Where are we going?’ inquired Aramis; ‘are we going to fight, perchance? I carry no sword this morning and cannot return home to procure one.’

‘No,’ said Lord de Winter, ‘we are going to pay a visit to Her Majesty the Queen of England.’

‘Oh, very well,’ replied Aramis; then bending his face down to Athos’s ear, ‘what is the object of this visit?’ continued he.

‘Nay, I know not; some evidence required from us, perhaps.’

‘May it not be about that cursed affair?’ asked Aramis, ‘in which case I do not greatly care to go, for it will be to pocket a lecture; and since it is my function to give them to others I am rather averse to receiving them myself.’

‘If it were so,’ answered Athos, ‘we should not be taken there by Lord de Winter, for he would come in for his share; he was one of us.’

‘You’re right; yes, let us go.’

On arriving at the Louvre Lord de Winter entered first; indeed, there was but one porter there to receive them at the gate.

It was impossible in daylight for the impoverished state of the habitation grudging charity had conceded to an unfortunate queen to pass unnoticed by Athos, Aramis, and even the Englishman. Large rooms, completely stripped of furniture, bare walls upon which, here and there, shone the old gold mouldings which had resisted time and neglect, windows with broken panes (impossible

‘YOU HAVE INSULTED THE CHURCH!’

Athos smiled, and his fine eye was dimmed by a tear. D'Artagnan, who had loved him so tenderly, loved him still, although a Mazarinist.

‘There are the fifty louis, if faith,’ said Aramis, emptying the purse on the table, all bearing the effigy of Louis XIII. ‘Well, what shall you do with this money, count? Shall you keep it or send it back?’

‘I shall keep it, Aramis, and even though I had no need of it I still should keep it. What is offered from a generous heart should be accepted generously. Take twenty-five of them, Aramis, and give me the remaining twenty-five.’

‘All right, I am glad to see you are of my opinion. There now, shall we start?’

‘When you like; but have you no groom?’

‘No; that idiot Bazin had the folly to make himself verger, as you know, and therefore cannot leave Notre Dame.’

‘Very well, take Blaisois, with whom I know not what to do, since I already have Grimaud.’

‘Willingly,’ said Aramis.

At this moment Grimaud appeared at the door. ‘Ready,’ said he, with his usual curtness.

‘Let us go, then,’ said Athos.

The two friends mounted, as did their servants. At the corner of the Quai they encountered Bazin, who was running breathlessly.

‘Oh, sir!’ exclaimed he, ‘thank Heaven I have arrived in time. Monsieur Porthos has just been to your house and has left this for you, saying that the letter was important and must be given to you before you left.’

‘Good,’ said Aramis, taking a purse which Bazin presented to him. ‘What is this?’

‘Wait, your reverence, there is a letter.’

‘You know I have already told you that if you ever call me anything but chevalier I will break every bone in your body. Give me the letter.’

‘How can you read?’ asked Athos, ‘it is as dark as a cold oven.’

‘Wait,’ said Bazin, striking a flint, and setting afire a twisted wax-light, with which he started the church candles. Thus illumined, Aramis read the following epistle:

My dear D'Herblay,

I learned from D'Artagnan who has embraced me on the part of the Comte de la Fère and yourself, that you are setting out on a journey which may perhaps last two or three months; as I know that you do not like to ask money of your friends I offer you some of my own accord. Here are two hundred pistoles, which you can dispose of as you wish and return to me when opportunity occurs. Do not fear that you put me to inconvenience; if I want money I can send for some to any of my châteaux; at Bracieux alone, I have twenty thousand francs in gold. So, if I do not send you more it is because I fear you would not accept a larger sum.

I address you, because you know, that although I esteem him from my heart I am a little awed by the Comte de la Fère; but it is understood that what I offer you I offer him at the same time.

I am, as I trust you do not doubt, your devoted

DU VALLON DE BRACIEUX DE PIERREFONDS.

'Well,' said Aramis, 'what do you say to that?'

'I say, my dear D'Herblay, that it is almost sacrilege to distrust Providence when one has such friends, and therefore we will divide the pistoles from Porthos, as we divided the louis sent by D'Artagnan.'

The division being made by the light of Bazin's taper, the two friends continued their road and a quarter of an hour later they had joined De Winter at the Porte Saint Denis.

Chapter XLII

Another Queen in Want of Help

THOS had not failed to send early to Aramis and had given his letter to Blaisois, the only serving-man whom he had left. Blaisois found Bazin donning his beadle's gown, his services being required that day at Notre Dame.

Athos had desired Blaisois to try to speak to Aramis himself. Blaisois, a tall, simple youth, who understood nothing but what he was expressly told, asked, therefore for the Abbé d'Herblay, and in spite of Bazin's assurances that his master was not at home, he persisted in such a manner as to put Bazin into a passion. Blaisois seeing Bazin in clerical guise, was a little discomposed at his denials and wanted to pass at all risks, believing too, that the man with whom he had to do was endowed with the virtues of his cloth, namely, patience and Christian charity.

But Bazin, still the servant of a musketeer, when once the blood mounted to his far cheeks, seized a broomstick and began belabouring Blaisois, saying: 'You have insulted the church, my friend, you have insulted the church!'

At this moment Aramis, aroused by this unusual disturbance, cautiously opened the door of his room; and Blaisois, looking reproachfully at the Cereberrus, drew the letter from his pocket and presented it to Aramis.

'From the Comte de la Fère,' said Aramis. 'All right.' And he retired into his room without even asking the cause of so much noise.

Blaisois returned disconsolate to the Hôtel of the 'Grand Roi Charlemagne' and when Athos inquired if his commission was executed, he related his adventure.

'You foolish fellow!' said Athos, laughing. 'And you did not tell him that you came from me?'

He certainly likes the child, but will he love me less as his affection grows for her?

And Athos confessed to himself that, he was unprepared for so prompt a departure; but Raoul was so happy that this reflection effaced everything else from the consideration of his guardian.

Everything was ready at ten o'clock for the departure, and as Athos was watching Raoul mount, a groom rode up from the Duchess de Chevreuse. He was charged to tell the Comte de la Fère, that she had learned of the return of her youthful protégé, and also the manner he had conducted himself on the field, and she added that she should be very glad to offer him her congratulations.

'Tell her grace,' replied Athos, 'that the viscount has just mounted his horse to proceed to the Hôtel de Luynes.'

Then, with renewed instructions to Grimaud, Athos signified to Raoul that he could set out, and ended by reflecting that it was perhaps better that Raoul should be away from Paris at that moment.

Chapter XLIII

In Which it is Proved that First Impulses are Oftentimes the Best

HE three gentlemen took the road to Picardy, a road so well known to them and which recalled to Athos and Aramis some of the most picturesque adventures of their youth.

'If Mousqueton were with us,' observed Athos, on reaching the spot where they had had a dispute with the paviors, 'how he would tremble at passing this! Do you remember, Aramis, that it was here he received that famous bullet wound?'

'By my faith, 'twould be excusable in him to tremble,' replied Aramis, 'for even I feel a shudder at the recollection; hold, just above that tree is the little spot where I thought I was killed.'

It was soon time for Grimaud to recall the past. Arriving before the inn at which his master and himself had made such an enormous repast, he approached Athos and said, showing him the airhole of the cellar:

'Sausages!'

Athos began to laugh, for this juvenile escapade of his appeared to be as amusing as if some one had related it of another person.

At last, after travelling two days and a night, they arrived at Boulogne toward the evening, favoured by magnificent weather. Boulogne was a strong position, then almost a deserted town, built entirely on the heights; what is now called the lower town did not then exist.

'Gentlemen,' said De Winter, on reaching the gate of the town, 'let us do here as at Paris—let us separate to avoid suspicion. I know an inn, little frequented, but of which the host is entirely devoted to me. I will go there, where I expect to find letters, and you go to the first tavern in the town, to L'Epée du Grand Henri for instance, refresh yourselves, and in two hours be upon the jetty; our boat is waiting for us there.'

The matter being thus decided, the two friends found, about two hundred paces further, the tavern indicated. Their horses were fed, but not unsaddled; the grooms supped, for it was already late, and their two masters, impatient to return, appointed a place of meeting with them on the jetty and desired them on no account to exchange a word with any one. It is needless to say that this caution concerned Blaisois alone—long enough since it had been a useless one to Grimaud.

Athos and Aramis walked down toward the port. From their dress, covered with dust, and from a certain easy manner by means of which a man accustomed to travel is always recognizable, the two friends excited the attention of a few promenaders. There was more especially one upon whom their arrival had produced a decided impression. This man, whom they had noticed from the first for the same reason they had themselves been remarked by others, was walking in a listless way up and down the jetty. From the moment he perceived them he did not cease to look at them and seemed to burn with the wish to speak to them.

On reaching the jetty Athos and Aramis stopped to look at a little boat made fast to a pile and ready rigged as if waiting to start.

'That is doubtless our boat,' said Athos.

'Yes,' replied Aramis, 'and the sloop out there making ready to sail must be that which is to take us to our destination; now,' continued he, 'if only De Winter does not keep us waiting. It is not at all amusing here; there is not a single woman passing.'

'Hush!' said Athos, 'we are overheard.'

In truth, the walker, who, during the observations of the two friends, had passed and repassed behind them several times, stopped at the name of De Winter; but as his face betrayed no emotion at mention of this name, it might have been by chance he stood so still.

'Gentlemen,' said the man, who was young and pale, bowing with ease and courtesy, 'pardon my curiosity, but I see you come from Paris, or at least that you are strangers at Boulogne.'

'Already up, Raoul?' exclaimed the count.

'Yes, sir,' replied Raoul, with slight hesitation; 'I did not sleep well.'

'You, Raoul, not sleep well! then you must have something on your mind!' said Athos.

'Sir, you will perhaps think that I am in a great hurry to leave you when I have only just arrived, but—'

'Have you only two days of leave, Raoul?'

'On the contrary, sir, I have ten; nor is it to the camp I wish to go.'

'Where, then?' said Athos, smiling, 'if it be not a secret. You are now almost a man, since you have made your first passage of arms, and have acquired the right to go where you will without consulting me.'

'Never, sir,' said Raoul, 'as long as I possess the happiness of having you for a protector, shall I deem I have the right of freeing myself from a guardianship so valuable to me. I have, however, a wish to go and pass a day at Blois. You look at me and you are going to laugh at me.'

'No, on the contrary, I am not inclined to laugh,' said Athos, suppressing a sigh. 'You wish to see Blois again; it is but natural.'

'Then you permit me to go, you are not angry in your heart?' exclaimed Raoul, joyously.

'Certainly, and why should I regret what gives you pleasure?'

'Oh! how kind you are,' exclaimed the young man, pressing his guardian's hand; 'and I can set out immediately?'

'When you like, Raoul.'

'Sir,' said Raoul, as he turned to leave the room, 'I have thought of one thing, and that is about the Duchess of Chevreuse, who was so kind to me and to whom I owe my introduction to the prince.'

'And you ought to thank her, Raoul. Well, try the Hôtel de Luynes, Raoul, and ask if the duchess can receive you. I am glad to see you pay attention to the usages of the world. You must take Grimaud and Olivain.'

'Both, sir?' asked Raoul, astonished.

'Both.'

Raoul went out, and when Athos heard his young, joyous voice calling to Grimaud and Olivain, he sighed.

'It is very soon to leave me,' he thought, 'but he follows the common custom. Nature has made us thus; she makes the young look ever forward, not behind.'

'It was thus, and by mere accident—may God pardon me if I blaspheme—that he heard the confession of the executioner of Béthune.'

'Then I understand it all! he has been sent by Cromwell to Mazarin, and the queen guessed rightly; we have been forestalled. Everything is clear to me now. Adieu, count, till to-morrow.'

'But the night is dark,' said Athos, perceiving that Lord de Winter seemed more uneasy than he wished to appear; 'and you have no servant.'

'I have Tony, a safe if simple youth.'

'Halloo, there, Grimaud, Olivain, and Blaisois! call the viscount and take the musket with you.'

Blaisois was the tall youth, half groom, half peasant, whom we saw at the Château de Bragelonne, whom Athos had christened by the name of his province.

'Viscount,' said Athos to Raoul, as he entered, 'you will conduct my lord as far as his hôtel and permit no one to approach him.'

'Oh! count,' said De Winter, 'for whom do you take me?'

'For a stranger who does not know Paris,' said Athos, 'and to whom the viscount will show the way.'

De Winter shook him by the hand.

'Grimaud,' said Athos, 'put yourself at the head of the troop and beware of the monk.'

Grimaud shuddered, and nodding, awaited the departure, regarding the butt of his musket with silent eloquence. Then obeying the orders given him by Athos, he headed the small procession, bearing the torch in one hand and the musket in the other, until it reached De Winter's inn, when pounding on the portal with his fist, he bowed to my lord and faced about without a word.

The same order was followed in returning, nor did Grimaud's searching glance discover anything of a suspicious appearance, save a dark shadow, as it were, in ambuscade, at the corner of the Rue Guénégaud and of the Quai. He fancied, also, that in going he had already observed the street watcher who had attracted his attention. He pushed on toward him, but before he could reach it the shadow had disappeared into an alley, into which Grimaud deemed it scarcely prudent to pursue it.

The next day, on awaking, the count perceived Raoul by his bedside. The young man was already dressed and was reading a new book by M. Chapelain.

'We come from Paris, yes,' replied Athos, with the same courtesy; 'what is there we can do for you?'

'Sir,' said the young man, 'will you be so good as to tell me if it be true that Cardinal Mazarin is no longer minister?'

'That is a strange question,' said Aramis.

'He is and he is not,' replied Athos; 'that is to say, he is dismissed by one-half of France, but by intrigues and promises he makes the other half sustain him; you will perceive that this may last a long time.'

'However, sir,' said the stranger, 'he has neither fled nor is in prison?'

'No, sir, not at this moment at least.'

'Sirs, accept my thanks for your politeness,' said the young man, retreating.

'What do you think of that interrogator?' asked Aramis.

'I think he is either a dull provincial person or a spy in search of information.'

'And you replied to him with that notion?'

'Nothing warranted me to answer him otherwise; he was polite to me and I was so to him.'

'But if he be a spy—'

'What do you think a spy would be about here? We are not living in the time of Cardinal Richelieu, who would have closed the ports on bare suspicion.'

'It matters not; you were wrong to reply to him as you did,' continued Aramis, following with his eyes the young man, now vanishing behind the cliffs.

'And you,' said Athos, 'you forget that you committed a very different kind of imprudence in pronouncing Lord de Winter's name. Did you not see that at that name the young man stopped?'

'More reason, then, when he spoke to you, for sending him about his business.'

'A quarrel?' asked Athos.

'And since when have you become afraid of a quarrel?'

'I am always afraid of a quarrel when I am expected at any place and when such a quarrel might possibly prevent my reaching it. Besides, let me own something to you. I am anxious to see that young man nearer.'

'And wherefore?'

'Aramis, you will certainly laugh at me, you will say that I am always repeating the same thing, you will call me the most timorous of visionaries; but to whom do you see a resemblance in that young man?'

'In beauty or on the contrary?' asked Aramis, laughing.

'In ugliness, in so far as a man can resemble a woman.'

'Ah! Egad!' cried Aramis, 'you set me thinking. No, in truth you are no visionary, my dear friend, and now I think of it—you—yes, i' faith, you're right—those delicate, yet firm-set lips, those eyes which seem always at the command of the intellect and never of the heart! Yes, it is one of Milady's bastards!'

'You laugh Aramis.'

'From habit, that is all. I swear to you, I like no better than yourself to meet that viper in my path.'

'Ah! here is De Winter coming,' said Athos.

'Good! one thing now is only awaiting and that is, that our grooms should not keep us waiting.'

'No,' said Athos. 'I see them about twenty paces behind my lord. I recognise Grimaud by his long legs and his determined slouch. Tony carries our muskets.'

'Then we set sail to-night?' asked Aramis, glancing toward the west, where the sun had left a single golden cloud, which, dipping into the ocean, appeared by degrees to be extinguished.

'Probably,' said Athos.

'Diable!' resumed Aramis, 'I have little fancy for the sea by day, still less at night; the sounds of wind and wave, the frightful movements of the vessel; I confess I prefer the convent of Noisy.'

Athos smiled sadly, for it was evident that he was thinking of other things as he listened to his friend and moved toward De Winter.

'What ails our friend?' said Aramis, 'he resembles one of Dante's damned, whose neck Apollyon has dislocated and who are ever looking at their heels. What the devil makes him glower thus behind him?'

When De Winter perceived them, in his turn he advanced toward them with surprising rapidity.

'What is the matter, my lord?' said Athos, 'and what puts you out of breath thus?'

'No,' said Athos; 'Monsieur Aramis does me the honour to share my opinions.'

'Could you put me in communication with your witty and agreeable friend? Is he much changed?'

'He has become an abbé, that is all.'

'You alarm me; his profession must have made him renounce any great undertakings.'

'On the contrary,' said Athos, smiling, 'he has never been so much a musketeer as since he became an abbé, and you will find him a veritable soldier.'

'Could you engage to bring him to me to-morrow morning at ten o'clock, on the Pont du Louvre?'

'Oh, oh!' exclaimed Athos, smiling, 'you have a duel in prospect.'

'Yes, count, and a splendid duel, too; a duel in which I hope you will take your part.'

'Where are we to go, my lord?'

'To Her Majesty the Queen of England, who has desired me to present you to her.'

'This is an enigma,' said Athos, 'but it matters not; since you know the solution of it I ask no further. Will your lordship do me the honour to sup with me?'

'Thanks, count, no,' replied De Winter. 'I own to you that that young man's visit has subdued my appetite and probably will rob me of my sleep. What undertaking can have brought him to Paris? It was not to meet me that he came, for he was ignorant of my journey. This young man terrifies me, my lord; there lies in him a sanguinary predisposition.'

'What occupies him in England?'

'He is one of Cromwell's most enthusiastic disciples.'

'But what attached him to the cause? His father and mother were Catholics, I believe?'

'His hatred of the king, who deprived him of his estates and forbade him to bear the name of De Winter.'

'And what name does he now bear?'

'Mordaunt.'

'A Puritan, yet disguised as a monk he travels alone in France.'

'Do you say as a monk?'