

‘READ THE LETTERS’

D'Artagnan and had arrived in time. The other was that which Laporte had placed in the hands of the Duke of Buckingham, warning him that he was about to be assassinated; that communication had arrived too late.

‘It is well, madame,’ said Mazarin; ‘nothing can gainsay such testimony.’

‘Sir,’ replied the queen, closing the coffer and leaning her hand upon it, ‘if there is anything to be said, it is that I have always been ungrateful to the brave men who saved me—that I have given nothing to that gallant officer, D'Artagnan, you were speaking of just now, but my hand to kiss and this diamond.’

As she spoke she extended her beautiful hand to the cardinal and showed him a superb diamond which sparkled on her finger.

‘It appears,’ she resumed, ‘that he sold it—he sold it in order to save me another time—to be able to send a messenger to the duke to warn him of his danger—he sold it to Monsieur des Essarts, on whose finger I remarked it. I bought it from him, but it belongs to D'Artagnan. Give it back to him, sir, and since you have such a man in your service, make him useful.’

‘Thank you, madame,’ said Mazarin. ‘I will profit by the advice.’

‘And now,’ added the queen, her voice broken by her emotion, ‘have you any other question to ask me?’

‘Nothing,’—the cardinal spoke in his most conciliatory manner—‘except to beg of you to forgive my unworthy suspicions. I love you so tenderly that I cannot help being jealous, even of the past.’

A smile, which was undefinable, passed over the lips of the queen.

‘Since you have no further interrogations to make, leave me, I beseech you,’ she said. ‘I wish, after such a scene, to be alone.’

Mazarin bent low before her.

‘I will retire, madame. Do you permit me to return?’

‘Yes, to-morrow.’

The cardinal took the queen's hand and pressed it with an air of gallantry to his lips.

Scarcely had he left her when the queen went into her son's room, and inquired from Laporte if the king was in bed. Laporte pointed to the child, who was asleep.

Anne ascended the steps side of the bed and softly kissed the placid forehead of her son; then she retired as silently as she had come, merely saying to Laporte:

‘Try, my dear Laporte, to make the king more courteous to Monsieur le Cardinal, to whom both he and I are under such important obligations.’

‘Ah! you confess it!’ exclaimed Mazarin.
‘Is it only the guilty whose honour is at the sport of others, sir? and cannot women be dishonoured by appearances? Yes, appearances were against me and I was about to suffer dishonour. However, I swear I was not guilty, I swear it by—’

The queen looked around her for some sacred object by which she could swear, and taking out of a cupboard hidden in the tapestry, a small coffer of rosewood set in silver, and laying it on the altar:

‘I swear,’ she said, ‘by these sacred relics that Buckingham was not my lover.’

‘What relics are those by which you swear?’ asked Mazarin, smiling. ‘I am incredulous.’

The queen untied from around her throat a small golden key which hung there, and presented it to the cardinal.

‘Open, sir,’ she said, ‘and look for yourself.’

Mazarin opened the coffer; a knife, covered with rust, and two letters, one of which was stained with blood, alone met his gaze.

‘What are these things?’ he asked.

‘What are these things?’ replied Anne, with queen-like dignity, extending toward the open coffer an arm, despite the lapse of years, still beautiful. ‘These two letters are the only ones I ever wrote to him. This knife is the knife with which Felton stabbed him. Read the letters and see if I have lied or spoken the truth.’

But Mazarin, notwithstanding this permission, instead of reading the letters, took the knife which the dying Buckingham had snatched out of the wound and sent by Laporte to the queen. The blade was red, for the blood had become rust; after a momentary examination during which the queen became as white as the cloth which covered the altar on which she was leaning, he put it back into the coffer with an involuntary shudder.

‘It is well, madame, I believe your oath.’

‘No, no, read,’ exclaimed the queen, indignantly; ‘read, I command you, for I am resolved that everything shall be finished to-night and never will I recur to this subject again. Do you think,’ she said, with a ghastly smile, ‘that I shall be inclined to reopen this coffer to answer any future accusations?’

Mazarin, overcome by this determination, read the two letters. In one the queen asked for the ornaments back again. This letter had been conveyed by

‘Yes, madame, often and often, but *pazienza*², as we say in Italy; next, after Monsieur de Condé, comes the Duke of Orléans.’

‘What are you saying? The first prince of the blood, the king’s uncle!’

‘No! not the first prince of the blood, not the king’s uncle, but the base conspirator, the soul of every cabal, who pretends to lead the brave people who are weak enough to believe in the honour of a prince of the blood—not the prince nearest to the throne, not the king’s uncle, I repeat, but the murderer of Chalais, of Montmorency and of Cinq-Mars, who is playing now the same game he played long ago and who thinks that he will win the game because he has a new adversary—instead of a man who threatened, a man who smiles. But he is mistaken; I shall not leave so near the queen that source of discord with which the deceased cardinal so often caused the anger of the king to rage above the boiling point.’

Anne blushed and buried her face in her hands.

‘What am I to do?’ she said, bowed down beneath the voice of her tyrant.

‘Endeavour to remember the names of those faithful servants who crossed the Channel in spite of Monsieur de Richelieu, tracking the roads along which they passed by their blood, to bring back to your majesty certain jewels given by you to Buckingham.’

Anne arose, full of majesty, and as if touched by a spring, and looking at the cardinal with the haughty dignity which in the days of her youth had made her so powerful: ‘You are insulting me!’ she said.

‘I wish,’ continued Mazarin, finishing, as it were, the speech this sudden movement of the queen had cut; ‘I wish, in fact, that you should now do for your husband what you formerly did for your lover.’

‘Again that accusation!’ cried the queen. ‘I thought that calumny was stifled or extinct; you have spared me till now, but since you speak of it, once for all, I tell you—’

‘Madame, I do not ask you to tell me,’ said Mazarin, asrounded by this returning courage.

‘I will tell you all,’ replied Anne. ‘Listen: there were in truth, at that epoch, four devoted hearts, four loyal spirits, four faithful swords, who saved more than my life—my honour—’

² patience

Chapter V

The Gascon and the Italian

MEANWHILE the cardinal returned to his own room; and after asking Bernouin, who stood at the door, whether anything had occurred during his absence, and being answered in the negative, he desired that he might be left alone.

When he was alone he opened the door of the corridor and then that of the ante-chamber. There D’Arragnan was asleep upon a bench.

The cardinal went up to him and touched his shoulder. D’Arragnan started, awakened himself, and as he awoke, stood up exactly like a soldier under arms.

‘Here I am,’ said he. ‘Who calls me?’

‘I,’ said Mazarin, with his most smiling expression.

‘I ask pardon of your eminence,’ said D’Arragnan, ‘but I was so fatigued—’

‘Don’t ask my pardon, monsieur,’ said Mazarin, ‘for you fatigued yourself in my service.’

D’Arragnan admired Mazarin’s gracious manner. ‘Ah,’ said he, between his teeth, ‘is there truth in the proverb that fortune comes while one sleeps?’

‘Follow me, monsieur,’ said Mazarin.

‘Come, come,’ murmured D’Arragnan, ‘Rochefort has kept his promise, but where in the devil is he?’ And he searched the cabinet even to the smallest recesses, but there was no sign of Rochefort.

‘Monsieur d’Arragnan,’ said the cardinal, sitting down on a fauteuil, ‘you have always seemed to me to be a brave and honourable man.’

‘Possibly,’ thought D’Arragnan, ‘but he has taken a long time to let me know his thoughts; nevertheless, he bowed to the very ground in gratitude for Mazarin’s compliment.’

‘Well,’ continued Mazarin, ‘the time has come to put to use your talents and your valour.’

There was a sudden gleam of joy in the officer’s eyes, which vanished immediately, for he knew nothing of Mazarin’s purpose.

‘Order, my lord,’ he said; ‘I am ready to obey your eminence.’

‘Monsieur d’Aragnan,’ continued the cardinal, ‘you performed sundry superb exploits in the last reign.’

Your eminence is too good to remember such trifles in my favour. It is true I fought with tolerable success.’

‘I don’t speak of your warlike exploits, monsieur,’ said Mazarin; ‘although they gained you much reputation, they were surpassed by others.’

D’Aragnan pretended astonishment.

‘Well, you do not reply?’ resumed Mazarin.

‘I am waiting, my lord, till you tell me of what exploits you speak.’

‘I speak of the adventure—Eh, you know well what I mean.’

‘Alas, no, my lord!’ replied D’Aragnan, surprised.

‘You are discreet—so much the better. I speak of that adventure in behalf of the queen, of the ornaments, of the journey you made with three of your friends.’

‘Aha!’ thought the Gascon; ‘is this a snare or not? Let me be on my guard.’ And he assumed a look of stupidity which Mendori or Bellerose, two of the first actors of the day, might have envied.

‘Bravo!’ cried Mazarin; ‘they told me that you were the man I wanted.’

Come, let us see what you will do for me.’

‘Everything that your eminence may please to command me,’ was the reply.

‘You will do for me what you have done for the queen?’

‘Certainly,’ D’Aragnan said to himself, ‘he wishes to make me speak out. He’s not more cunning than De Richelieu was! Devil take him!’ Then he said aloud:

‘The queen, my lord? I don’t comprehend!’

‘You don’t comprehend that I want you and your three friends to be of use to me?’

‘Which of my friends, my lord?’

‘Your three friends—the friends of former days.’

‘No; still there, but I only speak of him in order that I may introduce the name of another man. Do you know Monsieur d’Aragnan?’ he added, looking steadfastly at the queen.

Anne of Austria received the blow with a beating heart.

‘Has the Gascon been indiscreet?’ she murmured to herself, then said aloud:

‘D’Aragnan! stop an instant, the name seems certainly familiar. D’Aragnan! there was a musketeer who was in love with one of my women. Poor young creature! she was poisoned on my account.’

‘That’s all you know of him?’ asked Mazarin.

The queen looked at him, surprised.

‘You seem, sir,’ she remarked, ‘to be making me undergo a course of cross-examination.’

‘Which you answer according to your fancy,’ replied Mazarin.

‘Tell me your wishes and I will comply with them.’

The queen spoke with some impatience.

‘Well, madame,’ said Mazarin, bowing, ‘I desire that you give me a share in your friends, as I have shared with you the little industry and talent that Heaven has given me. The circumstances are grave and it will be necessary to act promptly.’

‘Still!’ said the queen. ‘I thought that we were finally quit of Monsieur de Beaufort.’

‘Yes, you saw only the torrent that threatened to overturn everything and you gave no attention to the still water. There is, however, a proverb current in France relating to water which is quiet.’

‘Continue,’ said the queen.

‘Well, then, madame, not a day passes in which I do not suffer affronts from your princes and your lordly servants, all of them automata who do not perceive that I wind up the spring that makes them move, nor do they see that beneath my quiet demeanour lies the still scorn of an injured, irritated man, who has sworn to himself to master them one of these days. We have arrested Monsieur de Beaufort, but he is the least dangerous among them. There is the Prince de Condé—’

‘The hero of Rocroy. Do you think of him?’

'That is not enough madame, it is necessary that your friends should be also mine.'

'My friends, monsieur?' The queen shook her head. 'Alas, I have them no longer!'

'How is it that you have no friends in your prosperity when you had many in adversity?'

'It is because in my prosperity I forgot those old friends, monsieur; because I have acted like Queen Marie de Médicis, who, returning from her first exile, treated with contempt all those who had suffered for her and, being proscribed a second time, died at Cologne abandoned by every one, even by her own son.'

'Well, let us see,' said Mazarin; 'isn't there still time to repair the evil? Search among your friends, your oldest friends.'

'What do you mean, monsieur?'

'Nothing else than I say—search.'

'Alas, I look around me in vain! I have no influence with any one. Monsieur is, as usual, led by his favourite; yesterday it was Choisy, to-day it is La Rivière, to-morrow it will be some one else. Monsieur le Prince is led by the coadjutor, who is led by Madame de Guénévée.'

'Therefore, madame, I ask you to look, not among your friends of to-day, but among those of other times.'

'Among my friends of other times?' said the queen.

'Yes, among your friends of other times; among those who aided you to contend against the Duc de Richelieu and even to conquer him.'

'What is he aiming at?' murmured the queen, looking uneasily at the cardinal.

'Yes,' continued his eminence; 'under certain circumstances, with that strong and shrewd mind your majesty possesses, aided by your friends, you were able to repel the attacks of that adversary.'

'I!' said the queen. 'I suffered, that is all.'

'Yes,' said Mazarin, 'as women suffer in avenging themselves. Come, let us come to the point. Do you know Monsieur de Rochefort?'

'One of my bitterest enemies—the faithful friend of Cardinal Richelieu.'

'I know that, and we sent him to the Bastille,' said Mazarin.

'Is he at liberty?' asked the queen.

'Of former days, my lord! In former days I had not only three friends, I had thirty; at two-and-twenty one calls every man one's friend.'

'Well, sir,' returned Mazarin, 'prudence is a fine thing, but to-day you might regret having been too prudent.'

'My lord, Pythagoras made his disciples keep silence for five years that they might learn to hold their tongues.'

'But you have been silent for twenty years, sir. Speak, now the queen herself releases you from your promise.'

'The queen!' said D'Aragnan, with an astonishment which this time was not pretended.

'Yes, the queen! And as a proof of what I say she commanded me to show you this diamond, which she thinks you know.'

And so saying, Mazarin extended his hand to the officer, who sighed as he recognised the ring so gracefully given to him by the queen on the night of the ball at the Hôtel de Ville and which she had repurchased from Monsieur des Essarts.

'Tis true. I remember well that diamond, which belonged to the queen.'

'You see, then, that I speak to you in the queen's name. Answer me without acting as if you were on the stage; your interests are concerned in your so doing.'

'Faith, my lord, it is very necessary for me to make my fortune, your eminence has so long forgotten me.'

'We need only a week to amend all that. Come, you are accounted for, you are here, but where are your friends?'

'I do not know, my lord. We have parted company this long time; all three have left the service.'

'Where can you find them, then?'

'Wherever they are, that's my business.'

'Well, now, what are your conditions, if I employ you?'

'Money, my lord, as much money as what you wish me to undertake will require. I remember too well how sometimes we were stopped for want of money, and but for that diamond, which I was obliged to sell, we should have remained on the road.'

'The devil he does! Money! and a large sum!' said Mazarin. 'Pray, are you aware that the king has no money in his treasury?'

'Do then as I did, my lord. Sell the crown diamonds. Trust me, don't let us try to do things cheaply. Great undertakings come poorly off with paltry means.'

'Well,' returned Mazarin, 'we will satisfy you.'

'Richelieu,' thought D'Artagnan, 'would have given me five hundred pistoles in advance.'

'You will then be at my service?' asked Mazarin.

'Yes, if my friends agree.'

'But if they refuse can I count on you?'

'I have never accomplished anything alone,' said D'Artagnan, shaking his head.

'Go, then, and find them.'

'What shall I say to them by way of inducement to serve your eminence?'

'You know them better than I. Adapt your promises to their respective characters.'

'What shall I promise?'

'That if they serve me as well as they served the queen my gratitude shall be magnificent.'

'But what are we to do?'

'Make your mind easy; when the time for action comes you shall be put in full possession of what I require from you; wait till that time arrives and find out your friends.'

'My lord, perhaps they are not in Paris. It is even probable that I shall have to make a journey. I am only a lieutenant of musketeers, very poor, and journeys cost money.'

'My intention,' said Mazarin, 'is not that you go with a great following; my plans require secrecy, and would be jeopardised by a too extravagant equipment.'

'Still, my lord, I can't travel on my pay, for it is now three months behind; and I can't travel on my savings, for in my twenty-two years of service I have accumulated nothing but debts.'

Mazarin remained some moments in deep thought, as if he were fighting with himself; then, going to a large cupboard closed with a triple lock, he took from it a bag of silver, and weighing it twice in his hands before he gave it to D'Artagnan:

'Why,' cried the queen, 'how is that?'
'Because, as they say in the opera of Thibide, "The whole world conspires to break our bonds."'

'You jest, sir!' answered the queen, endeavouring to assume something of her former dignity.

'Alas! I do not, madame,' rejoined Mazarin. 'Mark well what I say. The whole world conspires to break our bonds. Now as you are one of the whole world, I mean to say that you also are deserting me.'

'Cardinal!'

'Heavens! did I not see you the other day smile on the Duke of Orléans? or rather at what he said?'

'And what was he saying?'

'He said this, madame: "Mazarin is a stumbling-block. Send him away and all will then be well."'

'What do you wish me to do?'

'Oh, madame! you are the queen!'

'Queen, forsooth! when I am at the mercy of every scribbler in the Palais Royal who covers waste paper with nonsense, or of every country squire in the kingdom.'

'Nevertheless, you have still the power of banishing from your presence those whom you do not like!'

'That is to say, whom you do not like,' returned the queen.

'I! persons whom I do not like!'

'Yes, indeed. Who sent away Madame de Chevreuse after she had been persecuted twelve years under the last reign?'

'A woman of intrigue, who wanted to keep up against me the spirit of cabal she had raised against M. de Richelieu.'

'Who dismissed Madame de Hautefort, that friend so loyal that she refused the favour of the king that she might remain in mine?'

'A prude, who told you every night, as she undressed you, that it was a sin to love a priest, just as if one were a priest because one happens to be a cardinal.'

'Who ordered Monsieur de Beaufort to be arrested?'

'An incendiary the burden of whose song was his intention to assassinate me.'

'You see, cardinal,' replied the queen, 'that your enemies are mine.'

The queen had several times already told her son that he ought to go to bed, and several times Louis had coaxingly insisted on staying where he was; but now he made no reply, but turned pale and bit his lips with anger.

In a few minutes Laporte came into the room. The child went directly to him without kissing his mother.

‘Well, Louis,’ said Anne, ‘why do you not kiss me?’

‘I thought you were angry with me, madame; you sent me away.’

‘I do not send you away, but you have had the small-pox and I am afraid that sitting up late may tire you.’

‘You had no fears of my being tired when you ordered me to go to the palace to-day to pass the odious decrees which have raised the people to rebellion.’

‘Sire!’ interposed Laporte, in order to turn the subject, ‘to whom does your majesty wish me to give the candle?’

‘To any one, Laporte,’ the child said; and then added in a loud voice, ‘to any one except Mancini.’

Now Mancini was a nephew of Mazarin’s and was as much hated by Louis as the cardinal himself, although placed near his person by the minister.

And the king went out of the room without either embracing his mother or even bowing to the cardinal.

‘Good,’ said Mazarin, ‘I am glad to see that his majesty has been brought up with a hatred of dissimulation.’

‘Why do you say that?’ asked the queen, almost timidly.

‘Why, it seems to me that the way in which he left us needs no explanation. Besides, his majesty takes no pains to conceal how little affection he has for me. That, however, does not hinder me from being entirely devoted to his service, as I am to that of your majesty.’

‘I ask your pardon for him, cardinal,’ said the queen; ‘he is a child, not yet able to understand his obligations to you.’

The cardinal smiled.

‘But,’ continued the queen, ‘you have doubtless come for some important purpose. What is it, then?’

Mazarin sank into a chair with the deepest melancholy painted on his countenance.

‘It is likely,’ he replied, ‘that we shall soon be obliged to separate, unless you love me well enough to follow me to Italy.’

‘Take this,’ he said with a sigh, ‘’tis merely for your journey.’

‘If these are Spanish doubloons, or even gold crowns,’ thought D’Artagnan, ‘we shall yet be able to do business together.’ He saluted the cardinal and plunged the bag into the depths of an immense pocket.

‘Well, then, all is settled; you are to set off,’ said the cardinal.

‘Yes, my lord.’

‘Apropos, what are the names of your friends?’

‘The Count de la Fère, formerly styled Athos; Monsieur du Vallon, whom we used to call Porthos; the Chevalier d’Herblay, now the Abbé d’Herblay, whom we styled Aramis—’

The cardinal smiled.

‘Younger sons,’ he said, ‘who enlisted in the musketeers under feigned names in order not to lower their family names. Long swords but light purses. Was that it?’

‘If, God willing, these swords should be devoted to the service of your eminence,’ said D’Artagnan, ‘I shall venture to express a wish, which is, that in its turn the purse of your eminence may become light and theirs heavy—for with these three men your eminence may rouse all Europe if you like.’

‘These Gascons,’ said the cardinal, laughing, ‘almost bear the Italians in effrontery.’

‘At all events,’ answered D’Artagnan, with a smile almost as crafty as the cardinal’s, ‘they bear them when they draw their swords.’

He then withdrew, and as he passed into the courtyard he stopped near a lamp and dived eagerly into the bag of money.

‘Crown pieces only—silver pieces! I suspected it. Ah! Mazarin! Mazarin! thou hast no confidence in me! so much the worse for thee, for harm may come of it!’

Meanwhile the cardinal was rubbing his hands in great satisfaction.

‘A hundred pistols! a hundred pistols! for a hundred pistols I have discovered a secret for which Richelieu would have paid twenty thousand crowns; without reckoning the value of that diamond—he cast a complacent look at the ring, which he had kept, instead of restoring to D’Artagnan—which is worth, at least, ten thousand francs.’

He returned to his room, and after depositing the ring in a casket filled with brilliants of every sort, for the cardinal was a connoisseur in precious stones, he called to Bernouin to undress him, regardless of the noises of gun-fire that, though it was now near midnight, continued to resound through Paris.

In the meantime D'Aragnan took his way toward the Rue Tiquetonne, where he lived at the Hôtel de 'la Chevrete'.

We will explain in a few words how D'Aragnan had been led to choose that place of residence.

When Madame de Beauvais appeared at the door and announced the cardinal, the child, who had been absorbed in the pages of Quintus Curtius, enlivened as they were by engravings of Alexander's feats of arms, frowned and looked at his mother.

'Why,' he said, 'does he enter without first asking for an audience?'

Anne coloured slightly.

'The prime minister,' she said, 'is obliged in these unsettled days to inform the queen of all that is happening from time to time, without exciting the curiosity or remarks of the court.'

'But Richelieu never came in this manner,' said the pertinacious boy.

'How can you remember what Monsieur de Richelieu did? You were too young to know about such things.'

'I do not remember what he did, but I have inquired and I have been told all about it.'

'And who told you about it?' asked Anne of Austria, with a movement of impatience.

'I know that I ought never to name the persons who answer my questions,' answered the child, 'for if I do I shall learn nothing further.'

At this very moment Mazarin entered. The king rose immediately, took his book, closed it and went to lay it down on the table, near which he continued standing, in order that Mazarin might be obliged to stand also.

Mazarin contemplated these proceedings with a thoughtful glance. They explained what had occurred that evening.

He bowed respectfully to the king, who gave him a somewhat cavalier reception, but a look from his mother reproved him for the hatred which, from his infancy, Louis XIV had entertained toward Mazarin, and he endeavoured to receive the minister's homage with civility.

Anne of Austria sought to read in Mazarin's face the occasion of this unexpected visit, since the cardinal usually came to her apartment only after every one had retired.

The minister made a slight sign with his head, whereupon the queen said to Madame Beauvais:

'It is time for the king to go to bed; call Laporte.'

Chapter VI

D'Artagnan in his Fortieth Year

EARS have elapsed, many events have happened, alas! since, in our romance of The Three Musketeers, we took leave of D'Artagnan at № 12 Rue des Fossoyeurs. D'Artagnan had not failed in his career, but circumstances had been adverse to him. So long as he was surrounded by his friends he retained his youth and the poetry of his character. He was one of those fine, ingenuous natures which assimilate themselves easily to the dispositions of others. Athos imparted to him his greatness of soul, Porthos his enthusiasm, Aramis his elegance. Had D'Artagnan continued his intimacy with these three men he would have become a superior character. Athos was the first to leave him, in order that he might retire to a little property he had inherited near Blois; Porthos, the second, to marry an attorney's wife; and lastly, Aramis, the third, to take orders and become an abbé. From that day D'Artagnan felt lonely and powerless, without courage to pursue a career in which he could only distinguish himself on condition that each of his three companions should endow him with one of the gifts each had received from Heaven.

Notwithstanding his commission in the musketeers, D'Artagnan felt completely solitary. For a time the delightful remembrance of Madame Bonancieux left on his character a certain poetic tinge, perishable indeed; for like all other recollections in this world, these impressions were, by degrees, effaced. A garrison life is fatal even to the most aristocratic organization; and imperceptibly, D'Artagnan, always in the camp, always on horseback, always in garrison, became (I know not how in the present age one would express it) a typical trooper. His early refinement of character was not only not lost, it grew even greater than ever; but it was now applied to the little, instead of to the great things of life—to the martial condition of the soldier—comprised under the head of a good lodging, a rich table, a congenial hostess. These important advantages D'Artagnan found to his own taste in the Rue Tiquetonne at the sign of the Roe.

ANNE WAS LOOKING AT HER SON

From the time D'Artagnan took quarters in that hôtel, the mistress of the house, a pretty and fresh looking Flemish woman, twenty-five or twenty-six years old, had been singularly interested in him; and after certain love passages, much obstructed by an inconvenient husband to whom a dozen times D'Artagnan had made a pretence of passing a sword through his body, that husband had disappeared one fine morning, after furtively selling certain choice lots of wine, carrying away with him money and jewels. He was thought to be dead; his wife, especially, who cherished the pleasing idea that she was a widow, stoutly maintained that death had taken him. Therefore, after the connection had continued three years, carefully fostered by D'Artagnan, who found his bed and his mistress more agreeable every year, each doing credit to the other, the mistress conceived the extraordinary desire of becoming a wife and proposed to D'Artagnan that he should marry her.

'Ah, fie!' D'Artagnan replied. 'Bigamy, my dear! Come now, you don't really wish it?'

'But he is dead; I am sure of it.'

'He was a very contrary fellow and might come back on purpose to have us hanged.'

'All right; if he comes back you will kill him, you are so skilful and so brave.'

'Pette! my darling; another way of getting hanged.'

'So you refuse my request?'

'To be sure I do—furiously!'

The pretty landlady was desolate. She would have taken D'Artagnan not only as her husband, but as her God, he was so handsome and had so fierce a moustache.

Then along toward the fourth year came the expedition of Franche-Comté. D'Artagnan was assigned to it and made his preparations to depart. There were then great griefs, tears without end and solemn promises to remain faithful—all of course on the part of the hostess. D'Artagnan was too grand to promise anything; he purposed only to do all that he could to increase the glory of his name.

Chapter IV

Anne of Austria at the Age of Forty-Six

WHEN left alone with Bernouin, Mazarin was for some minutes lost in thought. He had gained much information, but not enough. Mazarin was a cheat at the card-table. This is a detail preserved to us by Brienne. He called it using his advantages. He now determined not to begin the game with D'Artagnan till he knew completely all his adversary's cards.

'My lord, have you any commands?' asked Bernouin.

'Yes, yes,' replied Mazarin. 'Light me; I am going to the queen.'

Bernouin took up a candlestick and led the way.

There was a secret communication between the cardinal's apartments and those of the queen; and through this corridor¹ Mazarin passed whenever he wished to visit Anne of Austria.

In the bedroom in which this passage ended, Bernouin encountered Madame de Beauvais, like himself intrusted with the secret of these subterranean love affairs; and Madame de Beauvais undertook to prepare Anne of Austria, who was in her oratory with the young king, Louis XIV, to receive the cardinal.

Anne, reclining in a large easy-chair, her head supported by her hand, her elbow resting on a table, was looking at her son, who was turning over the leaves of a large book filled with pictures. This celebrated woman fully understood the art of being dull with dignity. It was her practice to pass hours either in her oratory or in her room, without either reading or praying.

¹This secret passage is still to be seen in the Palais Royal.