

'He looked to me—but 'tis impossible.'

At this instant the sergeant, who had been for his orders, returned, and pointing to the three gentlemen in cloaks, said:

'The passports are in order; let these three gentlemen pass.'

The three gentlemen bowed and hastened to take advantage of this permission.

Aramis looked after them, and as the last of them passed close to him he pressed the hand of Athos.

'What is the matter with you, my friend?' asked the latter.

'I have—doubtless I am dreaming; tell me, sir,' he said to the sergeant, 'do you know those three gentlemen who are just gone out?'

'Only by their passports; they are three Frondistes, who are gone to rejoin the Duc de Longueville.'

'Tis strange,' said Aramis, almost involuntarily; 'I fancied that I recognised Mazarin himself.'

The sergeant burst into a fit of laughter.

'He!' he cried; 'he venture himself amongst us, to be hung! Not so foolish as all that.'

'Ah!' muttered Athos, 'I may be mistaken, I haven't the unerring eye of D'Artagnan.'

'Who is speaking of Monsieur D'Artagnan?' asked an officer who appeared at that moment upon the threshold of the room.

'What!' cried Aramis and Athos, 'what! Planchet!'

'Planchet,' added Grimaud; 'Planchet, with a gorget, indeed!'

'Ah, gentlemen!' cried Planchet, 'so you are back again in Paris. Oh, how happy you make us! no doubt you come to join the princes!'

'As thou seest, Planchet,' said Aramis, whilst Athos smiled on seeing what important rank was held in the city militia by the former comrade of Mousqueton, Bazin and Grimaud.

'And Monsieur d'Artagnan, of whom you spoke just now, Monsieur d'Herblay, may I ask if you have any news of him?'

'We parted from him four days ago and we have reason to believe that he has reached Paris before us.'

'No, sir; I am sure he hasn't yet arrived. But then he may have stopped at Saint Germain.'

'I don't think so; we appointed to meet at "La Cheverette".'

'I was there this very day.'

'And had the pretty Madeleine no news?' asked Aramis, smiling.

'No, sir, and it must be admitted that she seemed very anxious.'

'In fact,' said Aramis, 'there is no time lost and we made our journey quickly.'

Permit me, then, my dear Athos, without inquiring further about our friend, to pay my respects to M. Planchet.'

'Ah, monsieur le chevalier,' said Planchet, bowing.

'Lieutenant?' asked Aramis.

'Lieutenant, with a promise of becoming captain.'

'Tis capital; and pray, how did you acquire all these honours?'

'In the first place, gentlemen, you know that I was the means of Monsieur de Rochefort's escape; well, I was very near being hung by Mazarin and that made me more popular than ever.'

'So, owing to your popularity—'

'No; thanks to something better. You know, gentlemen, that I served the Piedmont regiment and had the honour of being a sergeant.'

'Yes.'

'Well, one day when no one could drill a mob of citizens, who began to march, some with the right foot, others with the left, I succeeded, I did, in making them all begin with the same foot, and I was made lieutenant on the spot.'

'So I presume,' said Athos, 'that you have a large number of the nobles with you?'

'Certainly. There are the Prince de Conti, the Duc de Longueville, the Duc de Beaufort, the Duc de Bouillon, the Maréchal de la Mothe, the Marquis de Sevigné, and I don't know who, for my part.'

'And the Vicomte Raoul de Bragelonne?' inquired Athos, in a tremulous voice. 'D'Artagnan told me that he had recommended him to your care, in parting.'

'Yes, count; nor have I lost sight of him for a single instant since.'

'Then,' said Athos in a tone of delight, 'he is well? no accident has happened to him?'

'None, sir.'

'And he lives?'

‘Still at the Hôtel of “the Great Charlemagne.”’

‘And passes his time?’

‘Sometimes with the queen of England, sometimes with Madame de Chevreuse. He and the Count de Guiche are like each other’s shadows.’

‘Thanks, Planchet, thanks!’ cried Athos, extending his hand to the lieutenant.

‘Oh, sir! Planchet only touched the tips of the count’s fingers.

‘Well, what are you doing, count—to a former lackey?’

‘My friend,’ said Athos, ‘he has given me news of Raoul.’

‘And now, gentlemen,’ said Planchet, who had not heard what they were saying, ‘what do you intend to do?’

‘Re-enter Paris, if you will let us, my good Planchet.’

‘Let you, sir? Now, as ever, I am nothing but your servant.’ Then turning to his men:

‘Allow these gentlemen to pass,’ he said; ‘they are friends of the Duc de Beaufort.’

‘Long live the Duc de Beaufort!’ cried the sentinels.

The sergeant drew near to Planchet.

‘What! without passports?’ he murmured.

‘Without passports,’ said Planchet.

‘Take notice, captain,’ he continued, giving Planchet his expected title, ‘take notice that one of the three men who just now went out from here told me privately to distrust these gentlemen.’

‘And I,’ said Planchet, with dignity, ‘I know them and I answer for them.’

As he said this, he pressed Grimaud’s hand, who seemed honoured by the distinction.

‘Farewell till we meet again,’ said Aramis, as they took leave of Planchet; ‘if anything happens to us we shall blame you for it.’

‘Sir,’ said Planchet, ‘I am in all things at your service.’

‘That fellow is no fool,’ said Aramis, as he got on his horse.

‘How should he be?’ replied Athos, whilst mounting also, ‘seeing he was used so long to brush your hats.’

‘We are going with a mission to Her Majesty, the Queen of England.’

‘Ah, every one seems to be going to see the queen of England. We have already at the station three gentlemen whose passports are under examination, who are on their way to her majesty. Where are your passports?’

‘We have none; we left England, ignorant of the state of politics here, having left Paris before the departure of the king.’

‘Ah!’ said the sergeant, with a cunning smile, ‘you are Mazarinists, who are sent as spies.’

‘My dear friend,’ here Athos spoke, ‘rest assured, if we were Mazarinists we should come well prepared with every sort of passport. In your situation distrust those who are well provided with every formality.’

‘Enter the guardroom,’ said the sergeant; ‘we will lay your case before the commandant of the post.’

The guardroom was filled with citizens and common people, some playing, some drinking, some talking. In a corner, almost hidden from view, were three gentlemen, who had preceded Athos and Aramis, and an officer was examining their passports. The first impulse of these three, and of those who last entered, was to cast an inquiring glance at each other. The first arrivals wore long cloaks, in whose drapery they were carefully enveloped; one of them, shorter than the rest, remained pertinaciously in the background.

When the sergeant on entering the room announced that in all probability he was bringing in two Mazarinists, it appeared to be the unanimous opinion of the officers on guard that they ought not to pass.

‘Be it so,’ said Athos; ‘yet it is probable, on the contrary, that we shall enter, because we seem to have to do with sensible people. There seems to be only one thing to do, which is, to send our names to Her Majesty the Queen of England, and if she engages to answer for us I presume we shall be allowed to enter.’

On hearing these words the shortest of the other three men seemed more attentive than ever to what was going on, wrapping his cloak around him more carefully than before.

‘Merciful goodness!’ whispered Aramis to Athos, ‘did you see?’

‘What?’ asked Athos.

‘The face of the shortest of those three gentlemen?’

‘No.’

arrived in Paris on the tenth of January and the Prince of Conti was named, but not until after a stormy discussion, generalissimo of the army of the king, out of Paris.

As for the Duc de Beaufort, he arrived from Vendôme, according to the annals of the day, bringing with him his high bearing and his long and beautiful hair, qualifications which gained him the sovereignty of the marketplaces.

The Parisian army had organised with the promptness characteristic of the bourgeois whenever they are moved by any sentiment whatever to disguise themselves as soldiers. On the nineteenth the impromptu army had attempted a sortie, more to assure itself and others of its actual existence than with any more serious intention. They carried a banner, on which could be read this strange device: 'We are seeking our king.'

The next following days were occupied in trivial movements which resulted only in the carrying off of a few herds of cattle and the burning of two or three houses.

That was still the situation of affairs up to the early days of February. On the first day of that month our four companions had landed at Boulogne, and, in two parties, had set out for Paris. Toward the end of the fourth day of the journey Athos and Aramis reached Nanterre, which place they cautiously passed by on the outskirts, fearing that they might encounter some troop from the queen's army.

It was against his will that Athos took these precautions, but Aramis had very judiciously reminded him that they had no right to be imprudent, that they had been charged by King Charles with a supreme and sacred mission, which, received at the foot of the scaffold, could be accomplished only at the feet of Queen Henrietta. Upon that, Athos yielded.

On reaching the capital Athos and Aramis found it in arms. The sentinel at the gate refused even to let them pass, and called his sergeant.

The sergeant, with the air of importance which such people assume when they are clad with military dignity, said:

'Who are you, gentlemen?'

'Two gentlemen.'

'And where do you come from?'

'From London.'

'And what are you going to do in Paris?'

Chapter LXXVI

The Ambassadors

HE two friends rode rapidly down the declivity of the Faubourg, but on arriving at the bottom were surprised to find that the streets of Paris had become rivers, and the open places lakes; after the great rains which fell in January the Seine had overflowed its banks and the river inundated half the capital. The two gentlemen were obliged, therefore, to get off their horses and take a boat, and in that strange manner they approached the Louvre.

Night had closed in, and Paris, seen thus, by the light of lanterns flickering on the pools of water, crowded with ferry-boats of every kind, including those that glittered with the armed patrols, with the watchword, passing from post to post—Paris presented such an aspect as to strongly seize the senses of Aramis, a man most susceptible to warlike impressions.

They reached the queen's apartments, but were compelled to stop in the ante-chamber, since her majesty was at that moment giving audience to gentlemen bringing her news from England.

'We, too,' said Athos, to the footman who had given him that answer, 'not only bring news from England, but have just come from there.'

'What? then, are your names, gentlemen?'

'The Comte de la Fère and the Chevalier d'Herblay,' said Aramis.

'Ah! in that case, gentlemen,' said the footman, on hearing the names which the queen had so often pronounced with hope, 'in that case it is another thing, and I think her majesty will pardon me for not keeping you here a moment. Please follow me,' and he went on before, followed by Athos and Aramis.

On arriving at the door of the room where the queen was receiving he made a sign for them to wait and opening the door:

Chapter LXXV

The Return

URING the six weeks that Athos and Aramis had been absent from France, the Parisians, finding themselves one morning without either queen or king, were greatly annoyed at being thus deserted, and the absence of Mazarin, a thing so long desired, did not compensate for that of the two august fugitives.

The first feeling that pervaded Paris on hearing of the flight to Saint Germain, was that sort of affright which seizes children when they awake in the night and find themselves alone. A deputation was therefore sent to the queen to entreat her to return to Paris; but she not only declined to receive the deputies, but sent an intimation by Chancellor Séguier, implying that if the parliament did not humble itself before her majesty by negating all the questions that had been the cause of the quarrel, Paris would be besieged the very next day.

This threatening answer, unluckily for the court, produced quite a different effect to that which was intended. It wounded the pride of the parliament, which, supported by the citizens, replied by declaring that Cardinal Mazarin was the cause of all the discontent; denounced him as the enemy both of the king and the state, and ordered him to retire from the court that same day and from France within a week afterward; enjoining, in case of disobedience on his part, all the subjects of the king to pursue and take him.

Mazarin being thus placed beyond the pale of the protection of the law, preparations on both sides were commenced—by the queen, to attack Paris, by the citizens, to defend it. The latter were occupied in breaking up the pavement and stretching chains across the streets, when, headed by the coadjutor, appeared the Prince de Conti (the brother of the Prince de Condé) and the Duc de Longueville, his brother-in-law. This unexpected band of auxiliaries

THE RIVER INUNDATED HALF THE CAPITAL

The two immediately started across country toward the road to Paris, followed by Mousqueton, who, after being too cold all night, at the end of a quarter of an hour found himself too warm.

'Madame,' he said, 'I hope your majesty will forgive me for disobeying your orders, when you learn that the gentlemen I have come to announce are the Comte de la Fère and the Chevalier d'Herblay.'

On hearing those two names the queen uttered a cry of joy, which the two gentlemen heard.

'Poor queen!' murmured Athos.

'Oh, let them come in! let them come in,' cried the young princess, bounding to the door.

The poor child was constant in her attendance on her mother and sought by her filial attentions to make her forget the absence of her two sons and her other daughter.

'Come in, gentlemen,' repeated the princess, opening the door herself.

The queen was seated on a fauteuil and before her were standing two or three gentlemen, and among them the Duc de Châtillon, the brother of the nobleman killed eight or nine years previously in a duel on account of Madame de Longueville, on the Place Royale. All these gentlemen had been noticed by Athos and Aramis in the guardhouse, and when the two friends were announced they started and exchanged some words in a low tone. 'Well, sirs!' cried the queen, on perceiving the two friends, 'you have come, faithful friends! But the royal couriers have been more expeditious than you, and here are Monsieur de Flamarens and Monsieur de Châtillon, who bring me from Her Majesty the Queen Anne of Austria, the very latest intelligence.'

Aramis and Athos were astounded by the calmness, even the gayety of the queen's manner.

'Go on with your recital, sirs,' said the queen, turning to the Duc de Châtillon. 'You said that His Majesty, King Charles, my august consort, had been condemned to death by a majority of his subjects!'

'Yes, madame,' Châtillon stammered out.

Athos and Aramis were more and more astonished.

'And that being conducted to the scaffold,' resumed the queen—'oh, my lord! oh, my king!—and that being led to the scaffold he had been saved by an indignant people.'

'Just so madame,' replied Châtillon, in so low a voice that though the two friends were listening eagerly they could hardly hear this affirmation.

The queen clasped her hands in enthusiastic gratitude, whilst her daughter threw her arms around her mother's neck and kissed her—her own eyes streaming with tears.

'Now, madame, nothing remains to me except to proffer my respectful homage,' said Châtilion, who felt confused and ashamed beneath the stern gaze of Athos.

'One moment, yes,' answered the queen. 'One moment—I beg—for here are the Chevalier d'Herblay and the Comte de la Fère, just arrived from London, and they can give you, as eye-witnesses, such details as you can convey to the queen, my royal sister. Speak, gentlemen, speak—I am listening; conceal nothing, gloss over nothing. Since his majesty still lives, since the honour of the throne is safe, everything else is a matter of indifference to me.'

Athos turned pale and laid his hand on his heart.

'Well!' exclaimed the queen, who remarked this movement and his paleness. 'Speak, sir! I beg you to do so.'

'I beg you to excuse me, madame; I wish to add nothing to the recital of these gentlemen until they perceive themselves that they have perhaps been mistaken.'

'Mistaken!' cried the queen, almost suffocated by emotion; 'mistaken! what has happened, then?'

'Sir,' interposed Monsieur de Flamarens to Athos, 'if we are mistaken the error has originated with the queen. I do not suppose you will have the presumption to set it to rights—that would be to accuse Her Majesty, Queen Anne, of falsehood.'

'With the queen, sir?' replied Athos, in his calm, vibrating voice.

'Yes,' murmured Flamarens, lowering his eyes.

Athos sighed deeply.

'Or rather, sir,' said Aramis, with his peculiar irritating politeness, 'the error of the person who was with you when we met you in the guardroom; for if the Comte de la Fère and I are not mistaken, we saw you in the company of a third gentleman.'

Châtilion and Flamarens started.

'Explain yourself, count!' cried the queen, whose anxiety grew greater every moment. 'On your brow I read despair—your lips falter ere you announce follow them and am still ready to rejoin them, in spite of all the Mazarins in the world.'

'You would be right, Porthos, but for one thing, which may change the current of your ideas; and that is, that it is not those gentlemen who are in the greatest danger, it is ourselves; it is not to abandon them that we have separated, but to avoid compromising them.'

'Really?' said Porthos, opening his eyes in astonishment.

'Yes, no doubt. If they are arrested they will only be put in the Bastille; if we are arrested it is a matter of the Place de Grève.'

'Oh! oh!' said Porthos, 'there is quite a gap between that fate and the baronial coronet you promised me, D'Aragnan.'

'Bah! perhaps not so great as you think, Porthos; you know the proverb, "All roads lead to Rome."'

'But how is it that we are incurring greater risks than Athos and Aramis?' asked Porthos.

'Because they have but fulfilled the mission confided to them by Queen Henrietta and we have betrayed that confided to us by Mazarin; because, going hence as emissaries to Cromwell, we became partisans of King Charles; because, instead of helping cut off the royal head condemned by those fellows called Mazarin, Cromwell, Joyce, Bridge, Fairfax, etc., we very nearly succeeded in saving it.'

'Upon my word that is true,' said Porthos; 'but how can you suppose, my dear friend, that in the midst of his great preoccupations General Cromwell has had time to think—'

'Cromwell thinks of everything; Cromwell has time for everything; and believe me, dear friend, we ought not to lose our time—it is precious. We shall not be safe till we have seen Mazarin, and then—'

'The devil!' said Porthos; 'what can we say to Mazarin?'

'Leave that to me—I have my plan. He laughs best who laughs last. Cromwell is mighty, Mazarin is tricky, but I would rather have to do with them than with the late Monsieur Mordaunt.'

'Ah!' said Porthos, 'it is very pleasant to be able to say "the late Monsieur Mordaunt."'

'My faith, yes,' said D'Aragnan. 'But we must be going.'

some terrible tidings—your hands tremble. Oh, my God! my God! what has happened?’

‘Lord!’ ejaculated the young princess, falling on her knees, ‘have mercy on us!’

‘Sir,’ said Châtilion, ‘if you bring bad tidings it will be cruel in you to announce them to the queen.’

Aramis went so close to Châtilion as almost to touch him.

‘Sir,’ said he, with compressed lips and flashing eyes, ‘you have not the presumption to instruct the Comte de la Fère and myself what we ought to say here?’

During this brief altercation Athos, with his hands on his heart, his head bent low, approached the queen and in a voice of deepest sorrow said:

‘Madame, princes—who by nature are above other men—receive from Heaven courage to support greater misfortunes than those of lower rank, for their hearts are elevated as their fortunes. We ought not, therefore, I think, to act toward a queen so illustrious as your majesty as we should act toward a woman of our lowlier condition. Queen, destined as you are to endure every sorrow on this earth, hear the result of our unhappy mission.’

Athos, kneeling down before the queen, trembling and very cold, drew from his bosom, inclosed in the same case, the order set in diamonds which the queen had given to Lord de Winter and the wedding ring which Charles I before his death had placed in the hands of Aramis. Since the moment he had first received these two mementoes Athos had never parted with them.

He opened the case and offered them to the queen with deep and silent anguish.

The queen stretched out her hand, seized the ring, pressed it convulsively to her lips—and without being able to breathe a sigh, to give vent to a sob, she extended her arms, became deadly pale, and fell senseless in the arms of her attendants and her daughter.

Athos kissed the hem of the robe of the widowed queen and rising, with a dignity that made a deep impression on those around:

‘I, the Comte de la Fère, a gentleman who has never deceived any human being, swear before God and before this unhappy queen, that all that was possible to save the king of England was done whilst we were on English ground. Now, chevalier,' he added, turning to Aramis, 'let us go. Our duty is fulfilled.'

THEY TURNED BACK TO UTTER AFFECTIONATE EXPRESSIONS

'Not yet,' said Aramis; 'we have still a word to say to these gentlemen.'

And turning to Châtillon: 'Sir, be so good as not to go away without giving me an opportunity to tell you something I cannot say before the queen.'

Châtillon bowed in token of assent and they all went out, stopping at the window of a gallery on the ground floor.

'Sir,' said Aramis, 'you allowed yourself just now to treat us in a most extraordinary manner. That would not be endurable in any case, and is still less so on the part of those who came to bring the queen the message of a liar.'

'Sir!' cried De Châtillon.

'What have you done with Monsieur de Bruy? Has he by any possibility gone to change his face which was too like that of Monsieur de Mazarin? There is an abundance of Italian masks at the Palais Royal, from harlequin even to pantaloon.'

'Chevalier! chevalier!' said Athos.

'Leave me alone,' said Aramis impatiently. 'You know well that I don't like to leave things half finished.'

'Conclude, then, sir,' answered De Châtillon, with as much hauteur as Aramis.

'Gentlemen,' resumed Aramis, 'any one but the Comte de la Fère and myself would have had you arrested—for we have friends in Paris—but we are contented with another course. Come and converse with us for just five minutes, sword in hand, upon this deserted terrace.'

'One moment, gentlemen,' cried Flanarens. 'I know well that the proposition is tempting; but at present it is impossible to accept it.'

'And why not?' said Aramis, in his tone of railery. 'Is it Mazarin's proximity that makes you so prudent?'

'Oh, you hear that, Flanarens!' said Châtillon. 'Not to reply would be a blot on my name and my honour.'

'That is my opinion,' said Aramis.

'You will not reply, however, and these gentlemen, I am sure, will presently be of my opinion.'

Aramis shook his head with a motion of indescribable insolence.

Châtillon saw the motion and put his hand to his sword.

should any ill-luck happen to two of us, will it not be much better that the other two should be spared to assist those who may be apprehended? Besides, who knows whether, divided, we may not obtain a pardon—you from the queen, we from Mazarin—which, were we all four together, would never be granted. Come, Athos and Aramis, go to the right; Porthos, come with me to the left; these gentlemen should file off into Normandy, whilst we, by the nearest road, reach Paris.'

He then gave his friends minute directions as to their route.

'Ah! my dear friend,' exclaimed Athos, 'how I should admire the resources of your mind did I not stop to adore those of your heart.'

And he gave him his hand.

'Isn't this fox a genius, Athos?' asked the Gascon. 'No! he knows how to crunch fowls, to dodge the huntsman and to find his way home by day or by night, that's all. Well, is all said?'

'All.'

'Then let's count our money and divide it. Ah! hurrah! there's the sun! A merry morning to you, Sunshine. 'Tis a long time since I saw thee!'

'Come, come, D'Arragnan,' said Athos, 'do not affect to be strong-minded; there are tears in your eyes. Let us be open with each other and sincere.'

'What!' cried the Gascon, 'do you think, Athos, we can take leave, calmly, of two friends at a time not free from danger to you and Aramis?'

'No,' answered Athos; 'embrace me, my son.'

'Zounds!' said Porthos, sobbing, 'I believe I'm crying; but how foolish all this is!'

Then they embraced. At that moment their fraternal bond of union was closer than ever, and when they parted, each to take the route agreed on, they turned back to utter affectionate expressions, which the echoes of the Dunes repeated. At last they lost sight of each other.

'Sacrebleu! D'Arragnan,' said Porthos, 'I must out with it at once, for I can't keep to myself anything I have against you; I haven't been able to recognise you in this matter.'

'Why not?' said D'Arragnan, with his wise smile.

'Because if, as you say, Athos and Aramis are in real danger, this is not the time to abandon them. For my part, I confess to you that I was all ready to Dawn was shedding its pallid, placid glimmer on the purple ocean, when at the distance of a musket shot from them was seen a dark gray mass, above which gleamed a triangular sail; then masters and servants joined in a fervent cry to the crew of that vessel to hear them and to save.

'A bark!' all cried together.

It was, in fact, a small craft from Dunkirk bound for Boulogne.

A quarter of an hour afterward the rowboat of this craft took them all aboard. Grimaud rendered twenty guineas to the captain, and at nine o'clock in the morning, having a fair wind, our Frenchmen set foot on their native land.

'Egad! how strong one feels here!' said Porthos, almost burying his large feet in the sands. 'Zounds! I could defy a nation!'

'Be quiet, Porthos,' said D'Arragnan, 'we are observed.'

'We are admired, if faith,' answered Porthos.

'These people who are looking at us are only merchants,' said Athos, 'and are looking more at the cargo than at us.'

'I shall not trust to that,' said the lieutenant, 'and I shall make for the Dunes¹ as soon as possible.'

The party followed him and soon disappeared with him behind the hillocks of sand unobserved. Here, after a short conference, they proposed to separate.

'And why separate?' asked Athos.

'Because,' answered the Gascon, 'we were sent, Porthos and I, by Cardinal Mazarin to fight for Cromwell; instead of fighting for Cromwell we have served Charles I—not the same thing by any means. In returning with the Comte de la Fère and Monsieur d'Herblay our crime would be confirmed. We have circumvented Cromwell, Mordaunt, and the sea, but we shall find a certain difficulty in circumventing Mazarin.'

'You forget,' replied Athos, 'that we consider ourselves your prisoners and not free from the engagement we entered into.'

'Truly, Athos,' interrupted D'Arragnan, 'I am vexed that such a man as you are should talk nonsense which schoolboys would be ashamed of. Chevalier,' he continued, addressing Aramis, who, leaning proudly on his sword, seemed to agree with his companion, 'Chevalier, Porthos and I run no risks, besides, ¹Sandy hills about Dunkirk, from which it derives its name.

'Willingly,' replied De Châtillon.

'Duke,' said Flamarens, 'you forget that to-morrow you are to command an expedition of the greatest importance, projected by the prince, assented to by the queen. Until to-morrow evening you are not at your own disposal.'

'Let it be then the day after to-morrow,' said Aramis.

'To-morrow, rather,' said De Châtillon, 'if you will take the trouble of coming so far as the gates of Charenton.'

'How can you doubt it, sir? For the pleasure of a meeting with you I would go to the end of the world.'

'Very well, to-morrow, sir.'

'I shall rely on it. Are you going to rejoin your cardinal? Swear first, on your honour, not to inform him of our return.'

'Conditions?'

'Why not?'

'Because it is for victors to make conditions, and you are not yet victors, gentlemen.'

'Then let us draw on the spot. It is all one to us—to us who do not command to-morrow's expedition.'

Châtillon and Flamarens looked at each other. There was such irony in the words and in the bearing of Aramis that the duke had great difficulty in bridling his anger, but at a word from Flamarens he restrained himself and contented himself with saying:

'You promise, sir—that's agreed—that I shall find you to-morrow at Charenton?'

'Oh, don't be afraid, sir,' replied Aramis, and the two gentlemen shortly afterward left the Louvre.

'For what reason is all this fume and fury?' asked Athos. 'What have they done to you?'

'They—did you not see what they did?'

'No.'

'They laughed when we swore that we had done our duty in England. Now, if they believed us, they laughed in order to insult us; if they did not believe it they insulted us all the more. However, I'm glad not to fight them until to-morrow. I hope we shall have something better to do to-night than to draw the sword.'

‘What have we to do?’

‘Egad! to take Mazarin.’

Athos curled his lip with disdain.

‘These undertakings do not suit me, as you know, Aramis.’

‘Why?’

‘Because it is taking people unawares.’

‘Really, Athos, you would make a singular general. You would fight only by broad daylight, warn your foe before an attack, and never attempt anything by night lest you should be accused of taking advantage of the darkness.’

Athos smiled.

‘You know one cannot change his nature,’ he said. ‘Besides, do you know what is our situation, and whether Mazarin’s arrest wouldn’t be rather an encumbrance than an advantage?’

‘Say at once you disapprove of my proposal.’

‘I think you ought to do nothing, since you exacted a promise from these gentlemen not to let Mazarin know that we were in France.’

‘I have entered into no engagement and consider myself quite free. Come, come.’

‘Where?’

‘Either to seek the Duc de Beaufort or the Duc de Bouillon, and to tell them about this.’

‘Yes, but on one condition—that we begin by the coadjutor. He is a priest, learned in cases of conscience, and we will tell him ours.’

It was then agreed that they were to go first to Monsieur de Bouillon, as his house came first; but first of all Athos begged that he might go to the Hôtel du ‘Grand Charlemagne,’ to see Raoul.

They re-entered the boat which had brought them to the Louvre and thence proceeded to the Halles; and taking up Grimaud and Blaisois, they went on foot to the Rue Guénégaud.

But Raoul was not at the Hôtel du ‘Grand Charlemagne.’ He had received a message from the prince, to whom he had hastened with Olivain the instant he had received it.

‘Yes, sir,’ answered Mousqueton; ‘but permit me to say I see nothing laughable in it. However,’ he added, turning to Porthos, ‘I should not regret dying, sir, were I sure that by doing so I might still be useful to you.’

‘Mouston,’ replied Porthos, much affected, ‘should we ever see my castle of Pierrefonds again you shall have as your own and for your descendants the vineyard that surrounds the farm.’

‘And you should call it “Devotion,”’ added Aramis; ‘the vineyard of self-sacrifice, to transmit to latest ages the recollection of your devotion to your master.’

‘Chevalier,’ said D’Arragnan, laughing, ‘you could eat a piece of Mouston, couldn’t you, especially after two or three days of fasting?’

‘Oh, no,’ replied Aramis, ‘I should much prefer Blaisois; we haven’t known him so long.’

One may readily conceive that during these jokes which were intended chiefly to divert Athos from the scene which had just taken place, the servants, with the exception of Grimaud, were not silent. Suddenly Mousqueton uttered a cry of delight, taking from beneath one of the benches a bottle of wine; and on looking more closely in the same place he discovered a dozen similar bottles, bread, and a monster junk of salted beef.

‘Oh, sir!’ he cried, passing the bottle to Porthos, ‘we are saved—the bark is supplied with provisions.’

This intelligence restored every one save Athos to gaiety.

‘Zounds!’ exclaimed Porthos, ‘’tis astonishing how empty violent agitation makes the stomach.’

And he drank off half a bottle at a draught and bit great mouthfuls of the bread and meat.

‘Now,’ said Athos, ‘sleep, or try to sleep, my friends, and I will watch.’

In a few moments, notwithstanding their wet clothes, the icy blast that blew and the previous scene of terror, these hardy adventurers, with their iron frames, inured to every hardship, threw themselves down, intending to profit by the advice of Athos, who sat at the helm, pensively wakeful, guiding the little bark the way it was to go, his eyes fixed on the heavens, as if he sought to verify not only the road to France, but the benign aspect of protecting Providence. After some hours of repose the sleepers were aroused by Athos.