

Cromwell had given orders that no one was to be allowed admission; but the sentinel, who knew that Mordaunt was one of the most confidential friends of the general, thought the order did not extend to the young man. Mordaunt, therefore, raised the canvas, and saw Cromwell seated before a table, his head buried in his hands, his back being turned.

Whether he heard Mordaunt or not as he entered, Cromwell did not move. Mordaunt remained standing near the door. At last, after a few moments, Cromwell raised his head, and, as if he divined that some one was there, turned slowly around.

'I said I wished to be alone,' he exclaimed, on seeing the young man.

'They thought this order did not concern me, sir; nevertheless, if you wish it, I am ready to go.'

'Ah! is it you, Mordaunt?' said Cromwell, the cloud passing away from his face; 'since you are here, it is well; you may remain.'

'I come to congratulate you.'

'To congratulate me—what for?'

'On the capture of Charles Stuart. You are now master of England.'

'I was much more really so two hours ago.'

'How so, general?'

'Because England had need of me to take the tyrant, and now the tyrant is taken. Have you seen him?'

'Yes, sir,' said Mordaunt.

'What is his bearing?'

Mordaunt hesitated; but it seemed as though he was constrained to tell the truth.

'Calm and dignified,' said he.

'What did he say?'

'Some parting words to his friends.'

'His friends?' murmured Cromwell. 'Has he any friends?' Then he added aloud, 'Did he make any resistance?'

'No, sir, with the exception of two or three friends every one deserted him; he had no means of resistance.'

'To whom did he give up his sword?'

'He did not give it up; he broke it.'

'He did well; but instead of breaking it, he might have used it to still more advantage.'

There was a momentary pause.

'I heard that the colonel of the regiment that escorted Charles was killed,' said Cromwell, staring very fixedly at Mordaunt.

'Yes, sir.'

'By whom?' inquired Cromwell.

'By me.'

'What was his name?'

'Lord Winter.'

'Your uncle?' exclaimed Cromwell.

'My uncle,' answered Mordaunt; 'but traitors to England are no longer members of my family.'

Cromwell observed the young man a moment in silence, then, with that profound melancholy Shakespeare describes so well:

'Mordaunt,' he said, 'you are a terrible servant.'

'When the Lord commands,' said Mordaunt, 'His commands are not to be disputed. Abraham raised the knife against Isaac, and Isaac was his son.'

'Yes,' said Cromwell, 'but the Lord did not suffer that sacrifice to be accomplished.'

'I have looked around me,' said Mordaunt, 'and I have seen neither goat nor kid caught among the bushes of the plain.'

Cromwell bowed. 'You are strong among the strong, Mordaunt,' he said; 'and the Frenchmen, how did they behave?'

'Most fearlessly.'

'Yes, yes,' murmured Cromwell; 'the French fight well, and if my glass was good and I mistake not, they were foremost in the fight.'

'They were,' replied Mordaunt.

'After you, however,' said Cromwell.

'It was the fault of their horses, not theirs.'

Another pause.

'And the Scotch?'

'They kept their word and never stirred,' said Mordaunt.

'Wretched men!'

'Their officers wish to see you, sir.'

'I have no time to see them. Are they paid?'

'Yes, to-night.'

'Let them be off and return to their own country, there to hide their shame, if its hills are high enough; I have nothing more to do with them nor they with me. And now go, Mordaunt.'

'Before I go,' said Mordaunt, 'I have some questions and a favour to ask you, sir.'

'A favour from me?'

Mordaunt bowed.

'I come to you, my leader, my head, my father, and I ask you, master, are you contented with me?'

Cromwell looked at him with astonishment. The young man remained immovable.

'Yes,' said Cromwell; 'you have done, since I knew you, not only your duty, but more than your duty; you have been a faithful friend, a cautious negotiator, a brave soldier.'

'Do you remember, sir it was my idea, the Scotch treaty, for giving up the king?'

'Yes, the idea was yours. I had no such contempt for men before.'

'Was I not a good ambassador in France?'

'Yes, for Mazarin has granted what I desire.'

'Have I not always fought for your glory and interests?'

'Too ardently, perhaps; it is what I have just reproached you for. But what is the meaning of all these questions?'

'To tell you, my lord, that the moment has now arrived when, with a single word, you may recompense all these services.'

'Oh!' said Oliver, with a slight curl of his lip, 'I forgot that every service merits some reward and that up to this moment you have not been paid.'

'Sir, I can take my pay at this moment, to the full extent of my wishes.'

'How is that?'

'I have the payment under my hand; I almost possess it.'

'What is it? Have they offered you money? Do you wish a step, or some place in the government?'

'Sir, will you grant me my request?'

'Let us hear what it is, first.'

Chapter LVII

Oliver Cromwell

'HAVE you been to the general?' said Mordaunt to D'Arragnan and Porthos; 'you know he sent for you after the action.'

'We want first to put our prisoners in a place of safety,' replied D'Arragnan. 'Do you know, sir, these gentlemen are each of them worth fifteen hundred pounds?'

'Oh, be assured,' said Mordaunt, looking at them with an expression he vainly endeavoured to soften, 'my soldiers will guard them, and guard them well, I promise you.'

'I shall take better care of them myself,' answered D'Arragnan; 'besides, all they require is a good room, with sentinels, or their simple parole that they will not attempt escape. I will go and see about that, and then we shall have the honour of presenting ourselves to the general and receiving his commands for his eminence.'

'You think of starting at once, then?' inquired Mordaunt.

'Our mission is ended, and there is nothing more to detain us now but the good pleasure of the great man to whom we were sent.'

The young man bit his lips and whispered to his sergeant:

'You will follow these men and not lose sight of them; when you have discovered where they lodge, come and await me at the town gate.'

The sergeant made a sign of comprehension.

Instead of following the knot of prisoners that were being taken into the town, Mordaunt turned his steps toward the rising ground from whence Cromwell had witnessed the battle and on which he had just had his tent pitched.

Charles shuddered. The demon had known how to wound him. The remembrance of Stafford was a source of lasting remorse to him, the shadow that haunted him by day and night. The king looked around him. He saw a corpse at his feet. It was Winter's. He uttered not a word, nor shed a tear, but a deadly pallor spread over his face; he knelt down on the ground, raised Winter's head, and unfastening the Order of the Saint Esprit, placed it on his own breast.

'Lord Winter is killed, then?' inquired D'Aragnan, fixing his eyes on the corpse.

'Yes,' said Athos, 'by his own nephew.'

'Come, he was the first of us to go; peace be to him! he was an honest man,' said D'Aragnan.

'Charles Stuart,' said the colonel of the English regiment, approaching the king, who had just put on the insignia of royalty, 'do you yield yourself a prisoner?'

'Colonel Tomlison,' said Charles, 'kings cannot yield; the man alone submits to force.'

'Your sword.'

The king drew his sword and broke it on his knee.

At this moment a horse without a rider, covered with foam, his nostrils extended and eyes all fire, galloped up, and recognizing his master, stopped and neighed with pleasure; it was Arthur.

The king smiled, parted it with his hand and jumped lightly into the saddle.

'Now, gentlemen,' said he, 'conduct me where you will.'

Turning back again, he said, 'I thought I saw Winter move; if he still lives, by all you hold most sacred, do not abandon him.'

'Never fear, King Charles,' said Mordaunt, 'the bullet pierced his heart.'

'Do not breathe a word nor make the least sign to me or Porthos,' said D'Aragnan to Athos and Aramis, 'that you recognise this man, for Milady is not dead; her soul lives in the body of this demon.'

The detachment now moved toward the town with the royal captive; but on the road an aide-de-camp, from Cromwell, sent orders that Colonel Tomlison should conduct him to Holdenby Castle.

At the same time couriers started in every direction over England and Europe to announce that Charles Stuart was the prisoner of Oliver Cromwell.

'Sir, when you have told me to obey an order did I ever answer, "Let me see that order"?''

'If, however, your wish should be one impossible to fulfill?'

'When you have cherished a wish and have charged me with its fulfillment, have I ever replied, "It is impossible"?''

'But a request preferred with so much preparation—'

'Ah, do not fear, sir,' said Mordaunt, with apparent simplicity: 'it will not ruin you.'

'Well, then,' said Cromwell, 'I promise, as far as lies in my power, to grant your request; proceed.'

'Sir, two prisoners were taken this morning; will you let me have them?'

'For their ransom? have they then offered a large one?' inquired Cromwell.

'On the contrary, I think they are poor, sir.'

'They are friends of yours, then?'

'Yes, sir,' exclaimed Mordaunt, 'they are friends, dear friends of mine, and I would lay down my life for them.'

'Very well, Mordaunt,' exclaimed Cromwell, pleased at having his opinion of the young man raised once more; 'I will give them to you; I will not even ask who they are; do as you like with them.'

'Thank you, sir,' exclaimed Mordaunt, 'thank you; my life is always at your service, and should I lose it I should still owe you something; thank you; you have indeed repaid me munificently for my services.'

He threw himself at the feet of Cromwell, and in spite of the efforts of the Puritan general, who did not like this almost kingly homage, he took his hand and kissed it.

'What!' said Cromwell, arresting him for a moment as he arose; 'is there nothing more you wish? neither gold nor rank?'

'You have given me all you can give me, and from to-day your debt is paid.'

And Mordaunt darted out of the general's tent, his heart beating and his eyes sparkling with joy.

Cromwell gazed a moment after him.

'He has slain his uncle!' he murmured. 'Alas! what are my servants? Possibly this one, who asks nothing or seems to ask nothing, has asked more in the eyes of Heaven than those who tax the country and steal the bread of the poor.'

Nobody serves me for nothing. Charles, who is my prisoner, may still have friends, but I have none!

And with a deep sigh he again sank into the reverie that had been interrupted by Mordaunt.

'We are all four lost, if by the least gesture you discover that you recognise him.'

Then turning to the young man he exclaimed:

'A fine prize! a fine prize, friend Mordaunt, we have both myself and Monsieur du Vallon, taken two Knights of the Garter, nothing less.'

'But,' said Mordaunt, looking at Athos and Aramis with bloodshot eyes, 'these are Frenchmen, I imagine.'

'Faith, I don't know. Are you French, sir?' said he to Athos.

'I am,' replied the latter, gravely.

'Very well, my dear sir, you are the prisoner of a fellow countryman.'

'But the king—where is the king?' exclaimed Athos, anxiously.

D'Arragnan vigorously seized his prisoner's hand, saying:

'Eh! the king? We have secured him.'

'Yes,' said Aramis, 'through an infamous act of treason.'

Porthos pressed his friend's hand and said to him:

'Yes, sir, all is fair in war, stratagem as well as force; look yonder!'

At this instant the squadron, that ought to have protected Charles's retreat, was advancing to meet the English regiments. The king, who was entirely surrounded, walked alone in a great empty space. He appeared calm, but it was evidently not without a mighty effort. Drops of perspiration trickled down his face, and from time to time he put a handkerchief to his mouth to wipe away the blood that rilled from it.

'Behold Nebuchadnezzar!' exclaimed an old Puritan soldier, whose eyes flashed at the sight of the man they called the tyrant.

'Do you call him Nebuchadnezzar?' said Mordaunt, with a terrible smile; 'no, it is Charles the First, the king, the good King Charles, who despoils his subjects to enrich himself.'

Charles glanced a moment at the insolent creature who uttered this, but did not recognise him. Nevertheless, the calm religious dignity of his countenance abashed Mordaunt.

'Bon jour, messieurs!' said the king to the two gentlemen who were held by D'Arragnan and Porthos. 'The day has been unfortunate, but it is not your fault, thank God! But where is my old friend Winter?'

The two gentlemen turned away their heads in silence.
'In Strafford's company,' said Mordaunt, tauntingly.

'Wretch!' exclaimed Aramis, raising his pistol as he passed by him; but the powder flashed in the pan and it did not go off.

At this moment the whole regiment came up and they fell upon the few men who had held out, surrounding the two Frenchmen. Athos, after making sure that Lord Winter was really dead, let fall the corpse and said:

'Come, Aramis, now for the honour of France!' and the two Englishmen who were nearest to them fell, mortally wounded.

At the same moment a fearful 'hurrah!' rent the air and thirty blades glittered about their heads.

Suddenly a man sprang out of the English ranks, fell upon Athos, twined arms of steel around him, and tearing his sword from him, said in his ear:

'Silence! yield—you yield to me, do you not?'

A giant had seized also Aramis's two wrists, who struggled in vain to release himself from this formidable grasp.

'D'Art—' exclaimed Athos, whilst the Gascon covered his mouth with his hand.

'I am your prisoner,' said Aramis, giving up his sword to Porthos.

'Fire, fire!' cried Mordaunt, returning to the group surrounding the two friends.

'And wherefore fire?' said the colonel; 'every one has yielded.'

'It is the son of Milady,' said Athos to D'Arragnan.

'I recognise him.'

'It is the monk,' whispered Porthos to Aramis.

'I know it.'

And now the ranks began to open. D'Arragnan held the bridle of Athos's horse and Porthos that of Aramis. Both of them attempted to lead his prisoner off the battle-field.

This movement revealed the spot where Winter's body had fallen. Mordaunt had found it out and was gazing on his dead relative with an expression of malignant hatred.

Athos, though now cool and collected, put his hand to his belt, where his loaded pistols yet remained.

'What are you about?' said D'Arragnan.

'Let me kill him.'

'HE HAS SLAIN HIS UNCLE!'

But Aramis and Athos were the only ones to obey this command and the king's example.

'We are betrayed,' said the king in a low voice.

'Wait a moment,' said Athos, 'perhaps they do not recognise your majesty's voice, and await the order of their captain.'

'Have they not heard that of their colonel? But look! look!' cried the king, drawing up his horse with a sudden jerk, which threw it on its haunches, and seizing the bridle of Athos's horse.

'Ah, cowards! traitors!' screamed Lord Winter, whose voice they heard, whilst his men, quitting their ranks, dispersed all over the plain.

About fifteen men were ranged around him and awaited the charge of Cromwell's cuirassiers.

'Let us go and die with them!' said the king.

'Let us go,' said Athos and Aramis.

'All faithful hearts with me!' cried out Winter.

This voice was heard by the two friends, who set off, full gallop.

'No quarter!' cried a voice in French, answering to that of Winter, which made them tremble.

As for Winter, at the sound of that voice he turned pale, and was, as it were, petrified.

It was the voice of a cavalier mounted on a magnificent black horse, who was charging at the head of the English regiment, of which, in his ardor, he was ten steps in advance.

'Tis he!' murmured Winter, his eyes glazed and he allowed his sword to fall to his side.

'The king! the king!' cried out several voices, deceived by the blue ribbon and chestnut horse of Winter; 'take him alive.'

'No! it is not the king!' exclaimed the cavalier. 'Lord Winter, you are not the king; you are my uncle.'

At the same moment Mordaunt, for it was he, levelled his pistol at Winter; it went off and the ball entered the heart of the old cavalier, who with one bound on his saddle fell back into the arms of Athos, murmuring: 'He is avenged!'

'Think of my mother!' shouted Mordaunt, as his horse plunged and darted off at full gallop.

‘This is what I propose to do,’ said Athos. ‘We will divide our regiments into two squadrons. You will put yourself at the head of the first. We and his majesty will lead the second. If no obstacle occurs we will both charge together, force the enemy’s line and throw ourselves into the Tyne, which we must cross, either by fording or swimming; if, on the contrary, any repulse should take place, you and your men must fight to the last man, whilst we and the king proceed on our road. Once arrived at the brink of the river, should we even find them three ranks deep, as long as you and your regiment do your duty, we will look to the rest.’

‘To horse!’ said Lord Winter.

‘To horse!’ re-echoed Athos; ‘everything is arranged and decided.’

‘Now, gentlemen,’ cried the king, ‘forward! and rally to the old cry of France, “Montjoy and St Denis!” The war cry of England is too often in the mouths of traitors.’

The king mounted—the king on Winter’s horse and Winter on that of the king; then Winter took his place at the head of the first squadron, and the king, with Athos on his right and Aramis on his left, at the head of the second.

The Scotch army stood motionless and silent, seized with shame at sight of these preparations.

Some of the chieftains left the ranks and broke their swords in two.

‘There,’ said the king, ‘that consoles me; they are not all traitors.’

At this moment Winter’s voice was raised with the cry of ‘Forward!’

The first squadron moved off; the second followed, and descended from the plateau. A regiment of cuirassiers, nearly equal as to numbers, issued from behind the hill and came full gallop toward it.

The king pointed this out.

‘Sire,’ said Athos, ‘we foresaw this; and if Lord Winter’s men but do their duty, we are saved, instead of lost.’

At this moment they heard above all the galloping and neighing of the horses Winter’s voice crying out:

‘Sword in hand!’

At these words every sword was drawn, and glittered in the air like lightning. ‘Now, gentlemen,’ said the king in his turn, excited by this sight, ‘come, gentlemen, sword in hand!’

Chapter LVIII

Jesus Seigneur

MUST Mordaunt was making his way to Cromwell’s tent, D’Arragnan and Porthos had brought their prisoners to the house which had been assigned to them as their dwelling at New-castle.

The order given by Mordaunt to the sergeant had been heard by D’Arragnan, who accordingly, by an expressive glance, warned Athos and Aramis to exercise extreme caution. The prisoners, therefore, had remained silent as they marched along in company with their conquerors—which they could do with the less difficulty since each of them had occupation enough in answering his own thoughts.

It would be impossible to describe Mousqueton’s astonishment when from the threshold of the door he saw the four friends approaching, followed by a sergeant with a dozen men. He rubbed his eyes, doubting if he really saw before him Athos and Aramis; and forced at last to yield to evidence, he was on the point of breaking forth in exclamations when he encountered a glance from the eyes of Porthos, the repressive force of which he was not inclined to dispute.

Mousqueton remained glued to the door, awaiting the explanation of this strange occurrence. What upset him completely was that the four friends seemed to have no acquaintance with one another.

The house to which D’Arragnan and Porthos conducted Athos and Aramis was the one assigned to them by General Cromwell and of which they had taken possession on the previous evening. It was at the corner of two streets and had in the rear, bordering on the side street, stables and a sort of garden.

The windows on the ground floor, according to a custom in provincial villages, were barred, so that they strongly resembled the windows of a prison.

The two friends made the prisoners enter the house first, whilst they stood at the door, desiring Mousqueton to take the four horses to the stable.

‘Why don’t we go in with them?’ asked Porthos.

‘We must first see what the sergeant wishes us to do,’ replied D’Aragnan.

The sergeant and his men took possession of the little garden.

D’Aragnan asked them what they wished and why they had taken that position.

‘We have had orders,’ answered the man, ‘to help you in taking care of your prisoners.’

There could be no fault to find with this arrangement; on the contrary, it seemed to be a delicate attention, to be gratefully received; D’Aragnan, therefore, thanked the man and gave him a crown piece to drink to General Cromwell’s health.

The sergeant answered that Puritans never drank, and put the crown piece in his pocket.

‘Ah!’ said Porthos, ‘what a fearful day, my dear D’Aragnan!’

‘What! a fearful day, when to-day we find our friends?’

‘Yes; but under what circumstances?’

‘Tis true that our position is an awkward one; but let us go in and see more clearly what is to be done.’

‘Things look black enough,’ replied Porthos; ‘I understand now why Aramis advised me to strangle that horrible Mordaunt.’

‘Silence!’ cried the Gascon; ‘do not utter that name.’

‘But,’ argued Porthos, ‘I speak French and they are all English.’

D’Aragnan looked at Porthos with that air of wonder which a cunning man cannot help feeling at displays of crass stupidity.

But as Porthos on his side could not comprehend his astonishment, he merely pushed him indoors, saying, ‘Let us go in.’

They found Athos in profound despondency; Aramis looked first at Porthos and then at D’Aragnan, without speaking, but the latter understood his meaningful look.

‘You want to know how we came here?’ Tis easily guessed. Mazarin sent us with a letter to General Cromwell.’

‘Then I shall die, sword in hand,’ said Charles. ‘Monsieur le comte, monsieur le chevalier, if ever I am king—’

‘Sire, you have already done us more honour than simple gentlemen could ever aspire to, therefore gratitude is on our side. But we must not lose time. We have already wasted too much.’

The king again shook hands with all three, exchanged hats with Winter and went out.

Winter’s regiment was ranged on some high ground above the camp. The king, followed by the three friends, turned his steps that way. The Scotch camp seemed as if at last awakened; the soldiers had come out of their tents and taken up their station in battle array.

‘Do you see that?’ said the king. ‘Perhaps they are penitent and preparing to march.’

‘If they are penitent,’ said Athos, ‘let them follow us.’

‘Well!’ said the king. ‘what shall we do?’

‘Let us examine the enemy’s army.’

At the same instant the eyes of the little group were fixed on the same line which at daybreak they had mistaken for fog and which the morning sun now plainly showed was an army in order of battle. The air was soft and clear, as it generally is at that early hour of the morning. The regiments, the standards, and even the colours of the horses and uniforms were now clearly distinct.

On the summit of a rising ground, a little in advance of the enemy, appeared a short and heavy looking man; this man was surrounded by officers. He turned a spyglass toward the little group amongst which the king stood.

‘Does this man know your majesty personally?’ inquired Aramis.

Charles smiled.

‘That man is Cromwell,’ said he.

‘Then draw down your hat, sire, that he may not discover the substitution.’

‘Ah!’ said Athos, ‘how much time we have lost.’

‘Now,’ said the king, ‘give the word and let us start.’

‘Will you not give it, sire?’ asked Athos.

‘No; I make you my lieutenant-general,’ said the king.

‘Listen, then, Lord Winter. Proceed, sire, I beg. What we are going to say does not concern your majesty.’

The king, smiling, turned a few steps back.

'I think the only chance of saving your majesty has just been proposed by Monsieur d'Herblay. I humbly entreat your majesty to choose quickly, for we have not an instant to lose.'

'But if I accept, it is death, or at least imprisonment, for him who takes my place.'

'He will have had the glory of having saved his king,' cried Winter.

The king looked at his old friend with tears in his eyes; undid the Order of the Saint Esprit which he wore, to honour the two Frenchmen who were with him, and passed it around Winter's neck, who received on his knees this striking proof of his sovereign's confidence and friendship.

'It is right,' said Athos; 'he has served your majesty longer than we have.'

The king overheard these words and turned around with tears in his eyes.

'Wait a moment, sir,' said he; 'I have an order for each of you also.'

He turned to a closet where his own orders were locked up, and took out two ribbons of the Order of the Garter.

'These cannot be for us,' said Athos.

'Why not, sir?' asked Charles.

'Such are for royalty, and we are simple commoners.'

'Speak not of crowns. I shall not find amongst them such great hearts as yours. No, no, you do yourselves injustice; but I am here to do you justice. On your knees, count.'

Athos knelt down and the king passed the ribbon down from left to right as usual, raised his sword, and instead of pronouncing the customary formula, 'I make you a knight. Be brave, faithful and loyal,' he said, 'You are brave, faithful and loyal. I knight you, monsieur le comte.'

Then turning to Aramis, he said:

'It is now your turn, monsieur le chevalier.'

The same ceremony recommenced, with the same words, whilst Winter unlaced his leather cuirass, that he might disguise himself like the king. Charles, having proceeded with Aramis as with Athos, embraced them both.

'Sire,' said Winter, who in this trying emergency felt all his strength and energy fire up, 'we are ready.'

The king looked at the three gentlemen. 'Then we must fly!' said he.

'Flying through an army, sire,' said Athos, 'in all countries in the world is called charyng.'

'But how came you to fall into company with Mordaunt, whom I bade you distrust?' asked Athos.

'And whom I advised you to strangle, Porthos,' said Aramis.

'Mazarin again. Cromwell had sent him to Mazarin. Mazarin sent us to Cromwell. There is a certain fatality in it.'

'Yes, you are right, D'Arragnan, a fatality that will separate and ruin us! So, my dear Aramis, say no more about it and let us prepare to submit to destiny.'

'Zounds! on the contrary, let us speak about it; for it was agreed among us, once for all, that we should always hold together, though engaged on opposing sides.'

'Yes,' added Athos, 'I now ask you, D'Arragnan, what side you are on? Ah! behold for what end the wretched Mazarin has made use of you. Do you know in what crime you are to-day engaged? In the capture of a king, his degradation and his murder.'

'Oh! oh!' cried Porthos, 'do you think so?'

'You are exaggerating, Athos; we are not so far gone as that,' replied the lieutenant.

'Good heavens! we are on the very eve of it. I say, why is the king taken prisoner? Those who wish to respect him as a master would not buy him as a slave. Do you think it is to replace him on the throne that Cromwell has paid for him two hundred thousand pounds sterling? They will kill him, you may be sure of it.'

'I don't maintain the contrary,' said D'Arragnan. 'But what's that to us? I am here because I am a soldier and have to obey orders—I have taken an oath to obey, and I do obey; but you who have taken no such oath, why are you here and what cause do you represent?'

'That most sacred in the world,' said Athos; 'the cause of misfortune, of religion, royalty. A friend, a wife, a daughter, have done us the honour to call us to their aid. We have served them to the best of our poor means, and God will recompense the will, forgive the want of power. You may see matters differently, D'Arragnan, and think otherwise. I will not attempt to argue with you, but I blame you.'

'Heyday!' cried D'Arragnan, 'what matters it to me, after all, if Cromwell, who's an Englishman, revolts against his king, who is a Scotchman? I am myself a Frenchman. I have nothing to do with these things—why hold me responsible?’

‘Yes,’ said Porthos.

‘Because all gentlemen are brothers, because you are a gentleman, because the kings of all countries are the first among gentlemen, because the blind populace, ungrateful and brutal, always takes pleasure in pulling down what is above them. And you, you, D’Artagnan, a man sprung from the ancient nobility of France, bearing an honourable name, carrying a good sword, have helped to give up a king to beersellers, shopkeepers, and wagoners. Ah! D’Artagnan! perhaps you have done your duty as a soldier, but as a gentleman, I say that you are very culpable.’

D’Artagnan was chewing the stalk of a flower, unable to reply and thoroughly uncomfortable; for when turned from the eyes of Athos he encountered those of Aramis.

‘And you, Porthos,’ continued the count, as if in consideration for D’Artagnan’s embarrassment, ‘you, the best heart, the best friend, the best soldier that I know—you, with a soul that makes you worthy of a birth on the steps of a throne, and who, sooner or later, must receive your reward from an intelligent king—you, my dear Porthos, you, a gentleman in manners, in tastes and in courage, you are as culpable as D’Artagnan.’

Porthos blushed, but with pleasure rather than with confusion; and yet, bowing his head, as if humiliated, he said:

‘Yes, yes, my dear count, I feel that you are right.’

Athos arose.

‘Come,’ he said, stretching out his hand to D’Artagnan, ‘come, don’t be sullen, my dear son, for I have said all this to you, if not in the tone, at least with the feelings of a father. It would have been easier to me merely to have thanked you for preserving my life and not to have uttered a word of all this.’

‘Doubtless, doubtless, Athos. But here it is: you have sentiments, the devil knows what, such as every one can’t entertain. Who could suppose that a sensible man could leave his house, France, his ward—a charming youth, for we saw him in the camp—to fly to the aid of a rotten, worm-eaten royalty, which is going to crumble one of these days like an old hovel. The sentiments you air are certainly fine, so fine that they are superhuman.’

Chapter LVI

The Avenger

HEY all four entered the tent; they had no plan ready—they must think of one.

The king threw himself into an arm-chair. ‘I am lost,’ said he.

‘No, sire,’ replied Athos. ‘You are only betrayed.’

The king sighed deeply.

‘Betrayed! yes betrayed by the Scotch, amongst whom I was born, whom I have always loved better than the English. Oh, traitors that ye are!’

‘Sire,’ said Athos, ‘this is not a moment for recrimination, but a time to show yourself a king and a gentleman. Up, sire! up! for you have here at least three men who will not betray you. Ah! if we had been five!’ murmured Athos, thinking of D’Artagnan and Porthos.

‘What do you say?’ inquired Charles, rising.

‘I say, sire, that there is now but one way open. Lord Winter answers for his regiment, or at least very nearly so—we will not split straws about words—let him place himself at the head of his men, we will place ourselves at the side of your majesty, and we will mow a swath through Cromwell’s army and reach Scotland.’

‘There is another method,’ said Aramis. ‘Let one of us put on the dress and mount the king’s horse. Whilst they pursue him the king might escape.’

‘It is good advice,’ said Athos, ‘and if the king will do one of us the honour we shall be truly grateful to him.’

‘What do you think of this counsel, Winter?’ asked the king, looking with admiration at these two men, whose chief idea seemed to be how they could take on their shoulders all the dangers that assailed him.