

The four friends resumed their own clothes, girded on their swords, ordered Mousqueton and Blaisois to pay the bill and to arrange everything for immediate departure, and wrapped in their large cloaks left in search of their game.

The night was dark, snow was falling, the streets were silent and deserted. D'Arragnan led the way through the intricate windings and narrow alleys of the city and ere long they had reached the house in question. For a moment D'Arragnan thought that Parry's brother had disappeared; but he was mistaken. The robust Scotchman, accustomed to the snows of his native hills, had stretched himself against a post, and like a fallen statue, insensible to the inclemency of the weather, had allowed the snow to cover him. He rose, however, as they approached.

'Come,' said Athos, 'here's another good servant. Really, honest men are not so scarce as I thought.'

'Don't be in a hurry to weave crowns for our Scotchman. I believe the fellow is here on his own account, for I have heard that these gentlemen born beyond the Tweed are very vindictive. I should not like to be Groslow, if he meets him.'

'Well?' said Athos, to the man, in English.

'No one has come out,' he replied.

'Then, Porthos and Aramis, will you remain with this man while we go around to Grimaud?'

Grimaud had made himself a kind of sentry box out of a hollow willow, and as they drew near he put his head out and gave a low whistle.

'Soho!' cried Athos.

'Yes,' said Grimaud.

'Well, has anybody come out?'

'No, but somebody has gone in.'

'A man or a woman?'

'A man.'

'Ah! ah!' said D'Arragnan, 'there are two of them, then!'

'I wish there were four,' said Athos, 'the two parties would then be equal.'

'Perhaps there are four,' said D'Arragnan.

'What do you mean?'

'Other men may have entered before them and waited for them.'

'WE FOLLOWED HIM THROUGH THE CITY'

'We can find out,' said Grimaud. At the same time he pointed to a window, through the shutters of which a faint light streamed.

'That is true,' said D'Artagnan, 'let us call the others.'

They returned around the house to fetch Porthos and Aramis.

'Have you seen anything?' they asked.

'No, but we are going to,' replied D'Artagnan, pointing to Grimaud, who had already climbed some five or six feet from the ground.

All four came up together. Grimaud continued to climb like a cat and succeeded at last in catching hold of a hook, which served to keep one of the shutters back when opened. Then resting his foot on a small ledge he made a sign to show all was right.

'Well?' asked D'Artagnan.

Grimaud showed his closed hand, with two fingers spread out.

'Speak,' said Athos; 'we cannot see your signs. How many are there?'

'Two. One opposite to me, the other with his back to me.'

'Good. And the man opposite to you is—'

'The man I saw go in.'

'Do you know him?'

'I thought I recognised him, and was not mistaken. Short and stout.'

'Who is it?' they all asked together in a low tone.

'General Oliver Cromwell.'

The four friends looked at one another.

'And the other?' asked Athos.

'Thin and lanky.'

'The executioner,' said D'Artagnan and Aramis at the same time.

'I can see nothing but his back,' resumed Grimaud. 'But wait. He is moving; and if he has taken off his mask I shall be able to see. Ah—'

And as if struck in the heart he let go the hook and dropped with a groan.

'Did you see him?' they all asked.

'Yes,' said Grimaud, with his hair standing on end.

'The thin, spare man?'

'Yes.'

'The executioner, in short?' asked Aramis.

'Yes.'

'And who is it?' said Porthos.

himself on his face in the road. Next moment the door opened and the man disappeared.

'The scoundrel!' said Aramis. 'While you have been returning hither he will have escaped and we shall never find him.'

'Come, now, Aramis,' said D'Artagnan, 'you must be taking me for some one else.'

'Nevertheless,' said Athos, 'in your absence—'

'Well, in my absence haven't I put in my place Grimaud and the Scotchman? Before he had taken ten steps beyond the door I had examined the house on all sides. At one of the doors, that by which he had entered, I placed our Scotchman, making a sign to him to follow the man wherever he might go, if he came out again. Then going around the house I placed Grimaud at the other exit, and here I am. Our game is beaten up. Now for the tally-ho.'

Athos threw himself into D'Artagnan's arms.

'Friend,' he said, 'you have been too good in pardoning me; I was wrong, a hundred times wrong. I ought to have known you better by this time, but we are all possessed of a malignant spirit, which bids us doubt.'

'Humph!' said Porthos. 'Don't you think the executioner might be Master Cromwell, who, to make sure of this affair, undertook it himself?'

'Ah! just so. Cromwell is stout and short, and this man thin and lanky, rather tall than otherwise.'

'Some condemned soldier, perhaps,' suggested Athos, 'whom they have pardoned at the price of regicide.'

'No, no,' continued D'Artagnan, 'it was not the measured step of a foot soldier, nor was it the gait of a horseman. If I am not mistaken we have to do with a gentleman.'

'A gentleman!' exclaimed Athos. 'Impossible! It would be a dishonour to all the nobility.'

'Fine sport, by Jove!' cried Porthos, with a laugh that shook the windows. 'Fine sport!'

'Are you still bent on departure, Athos?' asked D'Artagnan.

'No, I remain,' replied Athos, with a threatening gesture that promised no good to whomsoever it was addressed.

'Swords, then!' cried Aramis, 'swords! let us not lose a moment.'

‘Well, while I was watching—not the king, as monsieur le comte thinks, for I know what it is to see a man led to death, and though I ought to be accustomed to the sight it always makes me ill—while I was watching the masked executioner, the idea came to me, as I said, to find out who he was. Now, as we are wont to complete ourselves each by all the rest and to depend on one another for assistance, as one calls his other hand to aid the first, I looked around instinctively to see if Porthos was there; for I had seen you, Aramis, with the king, and you, count, I knew would be under the scaffold, and for that reason I forgive you,’ he added, offering Athos his hand, ‘for you must have suffered much. I was looking around for Porthos when I saw near me a head which had been broken, but which, for better or worse, had been patched with plaster and with black silk. “Humph!” thought I, “that looks like my handiwork; I fancy I must have mended that skull somewhere or other.” And, in fact, it was that unfortunate Scotchman, Parry’s brother, you know, on whom Groslow amused himself by trying his strength. Well, this man was making signs to another at my left, and turning around I recognised the honest Grimaud. “Oh!” said I to him. Grimaud turned round with a jerk, recognised me, and pointed to the man in the mask. “Eh!” said he, which meant, “Do you see him?” “Parbleu!” I answered, and we perfectly understood one another. Well, everything was finished as you know. The mob dispersed. I made a sign to Grimaud and the Scotchman, and we all three retired into a corner of the square. I saw the executioner return into the king’s room, change his clothes, put on a black hat and a large cloak and disappear. Five minutes later he came down the grand staircase.’

‘You followed him?’ cried Athos.

‘I should think so, but not without difficulty. Every few minutes he turned around, and thus obliged us to conceal ourselves. I might have gone up to him and killed him. But I am not selfish, and I thought it might console you all a little to have a share in the matter. So we followed him through the lowest streets in the city, and in half an hour’s time he stopped before a little isolated house. Grimaud drew out a pistol. “Eh?” said he, showing it. I held back his arm. The man in the mask stopped before a low door and drew out a key; but before he placed it in the lock he turned around to see if he was being followed. Grimaud and I got behind a tree, and the Scotchman having nowhere to hide himself, threw

‘He—he—is—’ murmured Grimaud, pale as a ghost and seizing his master’s hand.

‘Who? He?’ asked Athos.

‘Mordaunt,’ replied Grimaud.

D’Aragnan, Porthos and Aramis uttered a cry of joy.

Athos stepped back and passed his hand across his brow.

‘Fatality!’ he muttered.

Athos turned pale. Every reproach his friend uttered struck deeply in his heart.

‘Ah! you remain in London?’ said Porthos.

‘Yes. And you?’

‘Hang it!’ said Porthos, a little perplexed between the two, ‘I suppose, as I came with you, I must go away with you. I can’t leave you alone in this abominable country.’

‘Thanks, my worthy friend. So I have a little adventure to propose to you when the count is gone. I want to find out who was the man in the mask, who so obligingly offered to cut the king’s throat.’

‘A man in a mask?’ cried Athos. ‘You did not let the executioner escape, then?’

‘The executioner is still in the cellar, where, I presume, he has had an interview with mine host’s bottles. But you remind me. Mousqueton!’

‘Sir,’ answered a voice from the depths of the earth.

‘Let out your prisoner. All is over.’

‘But,’ said Athos, ‘who is the wretch that has dared to raise his hand against his king?’

‘An amateur headsmen,’ replied Aramis, ‘who however, does not handle the axe amiss.’

‘Did you not see his face?’ asked Athos.

‘He wore a mask.’

‘But you, Aramis, who were close to him?’

‘I could see nothing but a gray beard under the fringe of the mask.’

‘Then it must be a man of a certain age.’

‘Oh!’ said D’Arragnan, ‘that matters little. When one puts on a mask, it is not difficult to wear a beard under it.’

‘I am sorry I did not follow him,’ said Porthos.

‘Well, my dear Porthos,’ said D’Arragnan, ‘that’s the very thing it came into my head to do.’

Athos understood all now.

‘Pardon me, D’Arragnan,’ he said. ‘I have distrusted God; I could the more easily distrust you. Pardon me, my friend.’

‘We will see about that presently,’ said D’Arragnan, with a slight smile. ‘Well, then?’ said Aramis.

'Well, cheer up!' said a loud voice from the staircase, which Porthos had just mounted. 'We are all mortal, my poor friends.'

'You are late, my dear Porthos.'

'Yes, there were some people on the way who delayed me. The wretches were dancing. I took one of them by the throat and three-quarters throttled him. Just then a patrol rode up. Luckily the man I had had most to do with was some minutes before he could speak, so I took advantage of his silence to walk off.'

'Have you seen D'Artagnan?'

'We got separated in the crowd and I could not find him again.'

'Oh!' said Athos, satirically, 'I saw him. He was in the front row of the crowd, admirably placed for seeing; and as on the whole the sight was curious, he probably wished to stay to the end.'

'Ah Comte de la Fête,' said a calm voice, though hoarse with running, 'is it your habit to calumniate the absent?'

This reproof stung Athos to the heart, but as the impression produced by seeing D'Artagnan foremost in a coarse, ferocious crowd had been very strong, he contented himself with replying:

'I am not calumniating you, my friend. They were anxious about you here; I simply told them where you were. You didn't know King Charles; to you he was only a foreigner and you were not obliged to love him.'

So saying, he stretched out his hand, but the other pretended not to see it and he let it drop again slowly by his side.

'Ugh! I am tired,' cried D'Artagnan, sitting down.

'Drink a glass of port,' said Aramis; 'it will refresh you.'

'Yes, let us drink,' said Athos, anxious to make it up by hobnobbing with D'Artagnan, 'let us drink and get away from this hateful country. The felucca is waiting for us, you know; let us leave to-night, we have nothing more to do here.'

'You are in a hurry, sir count,' said D'Artagnan.

'But what would you have us to do here, now that the king is dead?'

'Go, sir count,' replied D'Artagnan, carelessly; 'you see nothing to keep you a little longer in England? Well, for my part, I, a bloodthirsty ruffian, who can go and stand close to a scaffold, in order to have a better view of the king's execution—I remain.'

Chapter LXVIII Cromwell's House

I was, in fact, Mordaunt whom D'Artagnan had followed, without knowing it. On entering the house he had taken off his mask and imitation beard, then, mounting a staircase, had opened a door, and in a room lighted by a single lamp found himself face to face with a man seated behind a desk.

This man was Cromwell.

Cromwell had two or three of these retreats in London, unknown except to the most intimate of his friends. Mordaunt was among these.

'It is you, Mordaunt,' he said. 'You are late.'

'General, I wished to see the ceremony to the end, which delayed me.'

'Ah! I scarcely thought you were so curious as that.'

'I am always curious to see the downfall of your honour's enemies, and he was not among the least of them. But you, general, were you not at Whitehall?'

'No,' said Cromwell.

There was a moment's silence.

'Have you had any account of it?'

'None. I have been here since the morning. I only know that there was a conspiracy to rescue the king.'

'Ah, you knew that?' said Mordaunt.

'It matters little. Four men, disguised as workmen, were to get the king out of prison and take him to Greenwich, where a vessel was waiting.'

'And knowing all that, your honour remained here, far from the city, tranquil and inactive.'

'Tranquil, yes,' replied Cromwell. 'But who told you I was inactive?'

‘But—if the plot had succeeded?’

‘I wished it to do so.’

‘I thought your excellence considered the death of Charles I as a misfortune necessary to the welfare of England.’

‘Yes, his death; but it would have been more seemly not upon the scaffold.’

‘Why so?’ asked Mordaunt.

Cromwell smiled. ‘Because it could have been said that I had had him condemned for the sake of justice and had let him escape out of pity.’

‘But if he had escaped?’

‘Impossible; my precautions were taken.’

‘And does your honour know the four men who undertook to rescue him?’

‘The four Frenchmen, of whom two were sent by the queen to her husband and two by Mazarin to me.’

‘And do you think Mazarin commissioned them to act as they have done?’

‘It is possible. But he will not avow it.’

‘How so?’

‘Because they failed.’

‘Your honour gave me two of these Frenchmen when they were only guilty of fighting for Charles I. Now that they are guilty of a conspiracy against England will your honour give me all four of them?’

‘Take them,’ said Cromwell.

Mordaunt bowed with a smile of triumphant ferocity.

‘Did the people shout at all?’ Cromwell asked.

‘Very little, except “Long live Cromwell!”’

‘Where were you placed?’

Mordaunt tried for a moment to read in the general’s face if this was simply a useless question, or whether he knew everything. But his piercing eyes could by no means penetrate the sombre depths of Cromwell’s.

‘I was so situated as to hear and see everything,’ he answered.

It was now Cromwell’s turn to look fixedly at Mordaunt, and Mordaunt to make himself impenetrable.

Chapter LXVII

The Man in the Mask

HE snow was falling thick and icy. Aramis was the next to come in and to discover Athos almost insensible. But at the first words he uttered the comte roused himself from the kind of lethargy in which he had sunk.

‘Well,’ said Aramis, ‘beaten by fate!’

‘Beaten!’ said Athos. ‘Noble and unhappy king!’

‘Are you wounded?’ cried Aramis.

‘No, this is his blood.’

‘Where were you, then?’

‘Where you left me—under the scaffold.’

‘Did you see it all?’

‘No, but I heard all. God preserve me from another such hour as I have just passed.’

‘Then you know that I did not leave him?’

‘I heard your voice up to the last moment.’

‘Here is the order he gave me and the cross I took from his hand; he desired they should be returned to the queen.’

‘Then here is a handkerchief to wrap them in,’ replied Athos, drawing from his pocket the one he had steeped in the king’s blood.

‘And what,’ he continued, ‘has been done with the poor body?’

‘By order of Cromwell royal honours will be accorded to it. The doctors are embalming the corpse, and when it is ready it will be placed in a lighted chapel.’

‘Mockery,’ muttered Athos, savagely; ‘royal honours to one whom they have murdered!’

'It appears,' said Cromwell, 'that this improvised executioner did his duty remarkably well. The blow, so they tell me at least, was struck with a master's hand.'

Mordaunt remembered that Cromwell had told him he had had no detailed account, and he was now quite convinced that the general had been present at the execution, hidden behind some screen or curtain.

'In fact,' said Mordaunt, with a calm voice and immovable countenance, 'a single blow sufficed.'

'Perhaps it was some one in that occupation,' said Cromwell.

'Do you think so, sir? He did not look like an executioner.'

'And who else save an executioner would have wished to fill that horrible office?'

'But,' said Mordaunt, 'it might have been some personal enemy of the king, who had made a vow of vengeance and accomplished it in this way. Perhaps it was some man of rank who had grave reasons for hating the fallen king, and who, learning that the king was about to flee and escape him, threw himself in the way, with a mask on his face and an axe in his hand, not as substitute for the executioner, but as an ambassador of Fate.'

'Possibly.'

'And if that were the case would your honour condemn his action?'

'It is not for me to judge. It rests between his conscience and his God.'

'But if your honour knew this man?'

'I neither know nor wish to know him. Provided Charles is dead, it is the axe, not the man, we must thank.'

'And yet, without the man, the king would have been rescued.'

Cromwell smiled.

'They would have carried him to Greenwich,' he said, 'and put him on board a felucca with five barrels of powder in the hold. Once out to sea, you are too good a politician not to understand the rest, Mordaunt.'

'Yes, they would have all been blown up.'

'Just so. The explosion would have done what the axe had failed to do. Men would have said that the king had escaped human justice and been overtaken by God's. You see now why I did not care to know your gentleman in the mask; for really, in spite of his excellent intentions, I could not thank him for what he has done.'

Mordaunt bowed humbly. 'Sir,' he said, 'you are a profound thinker and your plan was sublime.'

'Say absurd, since it has become useless. The only sublime ideas in politics are those which bear fruit. So to-night, Mordaunt, go to Greenwich and ask for the captain of the felucca Lightning. Show him a white handkerchief knotted at the four corners and tell the crew to disembark and carry the powder back to the arsenal, unless, indeed—'

'Unless?' said Mordaunt, whose face was lighted by a savage joy as Cromwell spoke:

'This skiff might be of use to you for personal projects.'

'Oh, my lord, my lord!'

'That title,' said Cromwell, laughing, 'is all very well here, but take care a word like that does not escape your lips in public.'

'But your honour will soon be called so generally.'

'I hope so, at least,' said Cromwell, rising and putting on his cloak.

'You are going, sir?'

'Yes,' said Cromwell. 'I slept here last night and the night before, and you know it is not my custom to sleep three times in the same bed.'

'Then,' said Mordaunt, 'your honour gives me my liberty for to-night?'

'And even for all day to-morrow, if you want it. Since last evening,' he added, smiling, 'you have done enough in my service, and if you have any personal matters to settle it is just that I should give you time.'

'Thank you, sir; it will be well employed, I hope.'

Cromwell turned as he was going.

'Are you armed?' he asked.

'I have my sword.'

'And no one waiting for you outside?'

'No.'

'Then you had better come with me.'

'Thank you, sir, but the way by the subterranean passage would take too much time and I have none to lose.'

Cromwell placed his hand on a hidden handle and opened a door so well concealed by the tapestry that the most practised eye could not have discovered it. It closed after him with a spring. This door communicated with a subterranean passage, leading under the street to a groto in the garden of a house about a hundred yards from that of the future Protector.

'Faithful friend, noble heart!' said the king, 'I should not have been rescued. I have addressed my people and I have spoken to God; last of all I speak to you. To maintain a cause which I believed sacred I have lost the throne and my children their inheritance. A million in gold remains; it is buried in the cellars of Newcastle Keep. You only know that this money exists. Make use of it; then, whenever you think it will be most useful, for my eldest son's welfare. And now, farewell.'

'Farewell, saintly, martyred majesty,' lisped Athos, chilled with terror. A moment's silence ensued and then, in a full, sonorous voice, the king exclaimed: 'Remember!'

He had scarcely uttered the word when a heavy blow shook the scaffold and where Athos stood immovable a warm drop fell upon his brow. He reeled back with a shudder and the same moment the drops became a crimson cataract.

Athos fell on his knees and remained some minutes as if bewildered or stunned. At last he rose and taking his handkerchief steeped it in the blood of the martyred king. Then as the crowd gradually dispersed he leaped down, crept from behind the drapery, glided between two horses, mingled with the crowd and was the first to arrive at the inn.

Having gained his room he raised his hand to his face, and observing that his fingers were covered with the monarch's blood, fell down insensible.

by the side of his hat. Then, as it was cold, he asked for his gown, which was brought to him.

All the preparations were made with a frightful calmness. One would have thought the king was going to bed and not to his coffin.

'Will these be in your way?' he said to the executioner, raising his long locks; 'if so, they can be tied up.'

Charles accompanied these words with a look designed to penetrate the mask of the unknown headsmen. His calm, noble gaze forced the man to turn away his head. But after the searching look of the king he encountered the burning eyes of Aramis.

The king, seeing that he did not reply, repeated his question.

'It will do,' replied the man, in a tremulous voice, 'if you separate them across the neck.'

The king parted his hair with his hands, and looking at the block he said:

'This block is very low, is there no other to be had?'

'It is the usual block,' answered the man in the mask.

'Do you think you can behead me with a single blow?' asked the king. 'I hope so,' was the reply. There was something so strange in these three words that everybody, except the king, shuddered.

'I do not wish to be taken by surprise,' added the king. 'I shall kneel down to pray; do not strike then.'

'When shall I strike?'

'When I shall lay my head on the block and say "Remember!" then strike boldly.'

'Gentlemen,' said the king to those around him, 'I leave you to brave the tempest; I go before you to a kingdom which knows no storms. Farewell.' He looked at Aramis and made a special sign to him with his head.

'Now,' he continued, 'withdraw a little and let me say my prayer, I beseech you. You, also, stand aside,' he said to the masked man. 'It is only for a moment and I know that I belong to you; but remember that you are not to strike till I give the signal.'

Then he knelt down, made the sign of the cross, and lowering his face to the planks, as if he would have kissed them, said in a low tone, in French, 'Comte de la Fère, are you there?'

'Yes, your majesty,' he answered, trembling.

It was just before this that Grimaud had perceived the two men seated together.

D'Artagnan was the first to recover from his surprise.

'Mordaunt,' he cried. 'Ah! by Heaven! it is God Himself who sent us here.'

'Yes,' said Porthos, 'let us break the door in and fall upon him.'

'No,' replied D'Artagnan, 'no noise. Now, Grimaud, you come here, climb up to the window again and tell us if Mordaunt is alone and whether he is preparing to go out or go to bed. If he comes out we shall catch him. If he stays in we will break in the window. It is easier and less noisy than the door.'

Grimaud began to scale the wall again.

'Keep guard at the other door, Athos and Aramis. Porthos and I will stay here.'

The friends obeyed.

'He is alone,' said Grimaud.

'We did not see his companion come out.'

'He may have gone by the other door.'

'What is he doing?'

'Putting on his cloak and gloves.'

'He's ours,' muttered D'Artagnan.

Porthos mechanically drew his dagger from the scabbard.

'Put it up again, my friend,' said D'Artagnan. 'We must proceed in an orderly manner.'

'Hush!' said Grimaud, 'he is coming out. He has put out the lamp, I can see nothing now.'

'Get down then and quickly.'

Grimaud leaped down. The snow deadened the noise of his fall.

'Now go and tell Athos and Aramis to stand on each side of the door and clap their hands if they catch him. We will do the same.'

The next moment the door opened and Mordaunt appeared on the threshold, face to face with D'Artagnan. Porthos clapped his hands and the other two came running around. Mordaunt was livid, but he uttered no cry nor called for assistance. D'Artagnan quietly pushed him in again, and by the light of a lamp on the staircase made him ascend the steps backward one by one, keeping his eyes all the time on Mordaunt's hands, who, however, knowing that it was useless, attempted no resistance. At last they stood face to face in the very room where ten minutes before Mordaunt had been talking to Cromwell.

Porthos came up behind, and unhooking the lamp on the staircase relit that in the room. Athos and Aramis entered last and locked the door behind them.

‘Oblige me by taking a seat,’ said D’Artagnan, pushing a chair toward Mordaunt, who sat down, pale but calm. Aramis, Porthos and D’Artagnan drew their chairs near him. Athos alone kept away and sat in the furthest corner of the room, as if determined to be merely a spectator of the proceedings. He seemed to be quite overcome. Porthos rubbed his hands in feverish impatience. Aramis bit his lips till the blood came.

D’Artagnan alone was calm, at least in appearance.

‘Monsieur Mordaunt,’ he said, ‘since, after running after one another so long, chance has at last brought us together, let us have a little conversation, if you please.’

who, carrying an axe in his hand, was recognised as the executioner. He approached the block and laid his axe upon it. Behind him, pale indeed, but marching with a firm step, was Charles Stuart, who advanced between two priests, followed by a few superior officers appointed to preside at the execution and attended by two files of partisans who took their places on opposite sides of the scaffold.

The sight of the masked man gave rise to a prolonged sensation. Every one was full of curiosity as to who that unknown executioner could be who presented himself so opportunely to assure to the people the promised spectacle, when the people believed it had been postponed until the following day. All gazed at him searchingly.

But they could discern nothing but a man of middle height, dressed in black, apparently of a certain age, for the end of a gray beard peeped out from the bottom of the mask that hid his features.

The king’s request had undoubtedly been acceded to by an affirmative sign, for in firm, sonorous accents, which vibrated in the depths of Athos’s heart, the king began his speech, explaining his conduct and counselling the welfare of the kingdom.

‘Oh!’ said Athos to himself, ‘is it indeed possible that I hear what I hear and that I see what I see? Is it possible that God has abandoned His representative on earth and left him to die thus miserably? And I have not seen him! I have not said adieu to him!’

A noise was heard like that the instrument of death would make if moved upon the block.

‘Do not touch the axe,’ said the king, and resumed his speech.

At the end of his speech the king looked tenderly around upon the people. Then unfastening the diamond ornament which the queen had sent him, he placed it in the hands of the priest who accompanied Juxon. Then he drew from his breast a little cross set in diamonds, which, like the order, had been the gift of Henrietta Maria.

‘Sir,’ said he to the priest, ‘I shall keep this cross in my hand till the last moment. Take it from me when I am—dead.’

‘Yes, sire,’ said a voice, which Athos recognised as that of Aramis.

He then took his hat from his head and threw it on the ground. One by one he undid the buttons of his doublet, took it off and deposited it