

of the Innocents, and Louvières's bourgeois at the corner of the Rue de la Monnaie.

The Maréchal de la Meilleraie was caught between two fires, but he was brave and made up his mind to die where he was. He returned blow for blow and cries of pain began to be heard in the crowd. The guards, more skilful, did greater execution; but the bourgeois, more numerous, overwhelmed them with a veritable hurricane of iron. Men fell around him as they had fallen at Rocroy or at Lerida. Fontailles, his aide-de-camp, had an arm broken; his horse had received a bullet in his neck and he had difficulty in controlling him, maddened by pain. In short, he had reached that supreme moment when the bravest feel a shudder in their veins, when suddenly, in the direction of the Rue de l'Arbre-Sec, the crowd opened, crying: 'Long live the coadjutor!' and Gondy, in surplice and cloak, appeared, moving tranquilly in the midst of the fusillade and bestowing his benedictions to the right and left, as undisturbed as if he were leading a procession of the Fête Dieu.

All fell to their knees. The marshal recognised him and hastened to meet him.

'Get me out of this, in Heaven's name!' he said, 'or I shall leave my carcass here and those of all my men.'

A great tumult arose, in the midst of which even the noise of thunder could not have been heard. Gondy raised his hand and demanded silence. All were still.

'My children,' he said, 'this is the Maréchal de la Meilleraie, as to whose intentions you have been deceived and who pledges himself, on returning to the Louvre, to demand of the queen, in your name, our Broussel's release. You pledge yourself to that, marshal?' added Gondy, turning to La Meilleraie.

'Morbleu!' cried the latter, 'I should say that I do pledge myself to it! I had no hope of getting off so easily.'

'He gives you his word of honour,' said Gondy.

The marshal raised his hand in token of assent.

'Long live the coadjutor!' cried the crowd. Some voices even added: 'Long live the marshal!' But all took up the cry in chorus: 'Down with Mazarin!'

The crowd gave place, the barricade was opened, and the marshal, with the remnant of his company, retreated, preceded by Friquet and his bandits, some of them making a presence of beating drums and others imitating the sound of the trumpet. It was almost a triumphal procession; only, behind the guards the barricades were closed again. The marshal bit his fingers.

In the meantime, as we have said, Mazarin was in his closet, putting his affairs in order. He called for D'Arragnan, but in the midst of such tumult he little expected to see him, D'Arragnan not being on service. In about ten minutes D'Arragnan appeared at the door, followed by the inseparable Porthos.

'Ah, come in, come in, Monsieur d'Arragnan!' cried the cardinal, 'and welcome your friend too. But what is going on in this accursed Paris?'

'What is going on, my lord? nothing good,' replied D'Arragnan, shaking his head. 'The town is in open revolt, and just now, as I was crossing the Rue Montorgueil with Monsieur du Vallon, who is here, and is your humble servant, they wanted in spite of my uniform, or perhaps because of my uniform, to make us cry "Long live Broussel!" and must I tell you, my lord what they wished us to cry as well?'

'Speak, speak.'

'"Down with Mazarin!" I"faith, the treasonable word is out.' Mazarin smiled, but became very pale.

'And you did cry?' he asked.

'I"faith, no,' said D'Arragnan; 'I was not in voice; Monsieur du Vallon has a cold and did not cry either. Then, my lord—'

'Then what?' asked Mazarin.

'Look at my hat and cloak.'

And D'Arragnan displayed four gunshot holes in his cloak and two in his beaver. As for Porthos's coat, a blow from a halberd had cut it open on the flank and a pistol shot had cut his feather in two.

'Diavolo!' said the cardinal, pensively gazing at the two friends with lively admiration; 'I should have cried, I should.'

At this moment the tumult was heard nearer.

Mazarin wiped his forehead and looked around him. He had a great desire to go to the window, but he dared not.

'See what is going on, Monsieur D'Arragnan,' said he.

D'Arragnan went to the window with his habitual composure. 'Oho!' said he, 'what is this? Maréchal de la Meilleraie returning without a hat—Fontrailles with his arm in a sling—wounded guards—horses bleeding; eh, then, what are the sentinels about? They are aiming—they are going to fire!'

'They have received orders to fire on the people if the people approach the Palais Royal!' exclaimed Mazarin.

'But if they fire, all is lost!' cried D'Arragnan.

'We have the gates.'

'The gates! to hold for five minutes—the gates, they will be torn down, twisted into iron wire, ground to powder! God's death, don't fire!' screamed D'Arragnan, throwing open the window.

In spite of this recommendation, which, owing to the noise, could scarcely have been heard, two or three musket shots resounded, succeeded by a terrible discharge. The balls might be heard peppering the facade of the Palais Royal, and one of them, passing under D'Arragnan's arm, entered and broke a mirror, in which Porthos was complacently admiring himself.

'Alack! alack!' cried the cardinal, 'a Venetian glass!'

'Oh, my lord,' said D'Arragnan, quietly shutting the window, 'it is not worth while weeping yet, for probably an hour hence there will not be one of your mirrors remaining in the Palais Royal, whether they be Venetian or Parisian.'

'But what do you advise, then?' asked Mazarin, trembling.

'Eh, egad, to give up Broussel as they demand! What the devil do you want with a member of the parliament? He is of no earthly use to anybody.'

'And you, Monsieur du Vallon, is that your advice? What would you do?'

'I should give up Broussel,' said Porthos.

'Come, come with me, gentlemen!' exclaimed Mazarin. 'I will go and discuss the matter with the queen.'

He stopped at the end of the corridor and said:

'I can count upon you, gentlemen, can I not?'

'We do not give ourselves twice over,' said D'Arragnan; 'we have given ourselves to you; command, we shall obey.'

and ears. Then a window was opened and when they saw and heard they were convinced.

Mazarin shrugged his shoulders and pretended to despise the populace; but he turned visibly pale and ran to his closet, trembling all over, locked up his gold and jewels in his caskets and put his finest diamonds on his fingers. As for the queen, furious, and left to her own guidance, she went for the Maréchal de la Meilleraie and desired him to take as many men as he pleased and to go and see what was the meaning of this pleasantry.

The marshal was ordinarily very adventurous and was wont to hesitate at nothing; and he had that lofty contempt for the populace which army officers usually profess. He took a hundred and fifty men and attempted to go out by the Pont du Louvre, but there he met Rochefort and his fifty horsemen, attended by more than five hundred men. The marshal made no attempt to force that barrier and returned up the quay. But at Pont Neuf he found Louvières and his bourgeois. This time the marshal charged, but he was welcomed by musket shots, while stones fell like hail from all the windows. He left there three men.

He beat a retreat toward the market, but there he met Planchet with his halberdiers; their halberds were levelled at him threateningly. He attempted to ride over those gray cloaks, but the gray cloaks held their ground and the marshal retired toward the Rue Saint Honoré, leaving four of his guards dead on the field of battle.

The marshal then entered the Rue Saint Honoré, but there he was opposed by the barricades of the mendicant of Saint Eustache. They were guarded, not only by armed men, but even by women and children. Master Fritquet, the owner of a pistol and of a sword which Louvières had given him, had organised a company of rogues like himself and was making a tremendous racket.

The marshal thought this barrier not so well fortified as the others and determined to break through it. He dismounted twenty men to make a breach in the barricade, whilst he and others, remaining on their horses, were to protect the assailants. The twenty men marched straight toward the barrier, but from behind the beams, from among the wagon-wheels and from the heights of the rocks a terrible fusillade burst forth and at the same time Planchet's halberdiers appeared at the corner of the Cemetery

It was now one o'clock in the morning and the coadjutor returned home. He opened a window and leaned out to listen. A strange, incomprehensible, unearthly sound seemed to pervade the whole city; one felt that something unusual and terrible was happening in all the streets, now dark as ocean's most unfathomable caves. From time to time a dull sound was heard, like that of a rising tempest or a billow of the sea; but nothing clear, nothing distinct, nothing intelligible; it was like those mysterious subterraneous noises that precede an earthquake.

The work of revolt continued the whole night thus. The next morning, on awaking, Paris seemed to be startled at her own appearance. It was like a besieged town. Armed men, shouldering muskets, watched over the barricades with menacing looks; words of command, patrols, arrests, executions, even, were encountered at every step. Those bearing plumed hats and gold swords were stopped and made to cry, 'Long live Broussel!' 'Down with Mazarin!' and whoever refused to comply with this ceremony was hooted at, spat upon and even beaten. They had not yet begun to slay, but it was well felt that the inclination to do so was not wanting.

The barricades had been pushed as far as the Palais Royal. From the Rue de Bons Enfants to that of the Ferronnerie, from the Rue Saint-Thomas-du-Louvre to the Pont Neuf, from the Rue Richelieu to the Porte Saint Honoré, there were more than ten thousand armed men; those who were at the front hurled defiance at the impassive sentinels of the regiment of guards posted around the Palais Royal, the gates of which were closed behind them, a precaution which made their situation precarious. Among these thousands moved, in bands numbering from one hundred to two hundred, pale and haggard men, clothed in rags, who bore a sort of standard on which was inscribed these words: 'BEHOLD THE MISERY OF THE PEOPLE!' Wherever these men passed, frenzied cries were heard; and there were so many of these bands that the cries were to be heard in all directions.

The astonishment of Mazarin and of Anne of Austria was great when it was announced to them that the city, which the previous evening they had left entirely tranquil, had awakened to such feverish commotion; nor would either the one or the other believe the reports that were brought to them, declaring they would rather rely on the evidence of their own eyes

'Very well, then,' said Mazarin; 'enter this cabinet and wait till I come back.'

And turning off he entered the drawing-room by another door.

A LENGTHY CHAIN OF PEOPLE

The coadjutor proceeded onward to the quay by way of the Rue de la Monnaie; there he found groups of bourgeois clad in black cloaks or gray, according as they belonged to the upper or lower bourgeoisie. They were standing motionless, while single men passed from one group to another. All these cloaks, gray or black, were raised behind by the point of a sword, or before by the barrel of an arquebuse or a musket.

On reaching the Pont Neuf the coadjutor found it strictly guarded and a man approached him.

'Who are you?' asked the man. 'I do not know you for one of us.'

'Then it is because you do not know your friends, my dear Monsieur Louvières,' said the coadjutor, raising his hat.

Louvières recognised him and bowed.

Gondy continued his way and went as far as the Tour de Nesle. There he saw a lengthy chain of people gliding under the walls. They might be said to be a procession of ghosts, for they were all wrapped in white cloaks. When they reached a certain spot these men appeared to be annihilated, one after the other, as if the earth had opened under their feet. Gondy, edged into a corner, saw them vanish from the first until the last but one. The last raised his eyes, to ascertain, doubtless, that neither his companions nor himself had been watched, and, in spite of the darkness, he perceived Gondy. He walked straight up to him and placed a pistol to his throat.

'Halloo! Monsieur de Rochefort,' said Gondy, laughing, 'are you a boy to play with firearms?'

Rochefort recognised the voice.

'Ah, it is you, my lord!' said he.

'The very same. What people are you leading thus into the bowels of the earth?'

'My fifty recruits from the Chevalier d'Humières, who are destined to enter the light cavalry and who have only received as yet for their equipment their white cloaks.'

'And where are you going?'

'To the house of one of my friends, a sculptor, only we enter by the trap through which he lets down his marble.'

'Very good,' said Gondy, shaking Rochefort by the hand, who descended in his turn and closed the trap after him.

Chapter XLVIII

The Riot Becomes a Revolution

HE closet into which D'Artagnan and Porthos had been ushered was separated from the drawing-room where the queen was by tapestried curtains only, and this thin partition enabled them to hear all that passed in the adjoining room, whilst the aperture between the two hangings, small as it was, permitted them to see.

The queen was standing in the room, pale with anger; her self-control, however, was so great that it might have been imagined that she was calm. Comminges, Villequier and Guitant were behind her and the women again were behind the men. The Chancellor Séguier, who twenty years previously had persecuted her so ruthlessly, stood before her, relating how his carriage had been smashed, how he had been pursued and had rushed into the Hôtel d'O——, that the hôtel was immediately invaded, pillaged and devastated; happily he had time to reach a closet hidden behind tapestry, in which he was secreted by an old woman, together with his brother, the Bishop of Meaux. Then the danger was so imminent, the rioters came so near, uttering such threats, that the chancellor thought his last hour had come and confessed himself to his brother priest, so as to be all ready to die in case he was discovered. Fortunately, however, he had not been taken; the people, believing that he had escaped by some back entrance, retired and left him at liberty to retreat. Then, disguised in the clothes of the Marquis d'O——, he had left the hôtel, stumbling over the bodies of an officer and two guards who had been killed whilst defending the street door.

During the recital Mazarin entered and glided noiselessly up to the queen to listen.

'Well,' said the queen, when the chancellor had finished speaking; 'what do you think of it all?'

'I think that matters look very gloomy, madame.'

'But what step would you propose to me?'

'I could propose one to your majesty, but I dare not.'

'You may, you may, sir,' said the queen with a bitter smile; 'you were not so timid once.'

The chancellor reddened and stammered some words.

'It is not a question of the past, but of the present,' said the queen; 'you said you could give me advice—what is it?'

'Madame,' said the chancellor, hesitating, 'it would be to release Broussel.'

The queen, although already pale, became visibly paler and her face was contracted.

'Release Broussel!' she cried, 'never!'

At this moment steps were heard in the ante-room and without any announcement the Maréchal de la Meilleraie appeared at the door.

'Ah, there you are, maréchal,' cried Anne of Austria joyfully. 'I trust you have brought this rabble to reason.'

'Madame,' replied the maréchal, 'I have left three men on the Pont Neuf, four at the Halle, six at the corner of the Rue de l'Arbre-Sec and two at the door of your palace—fifteen in all. I have brought away ten or twelve wounded. I know not where I have left my hat, and in all probability I should have been left with my hat, had the coadjutor not arrived in time to rescue me.'

'Ah, indeed,' said the queen, 'it would have much astonished me if that low cur, with his distorted legs, had not been mixed up with all this.'

'Madame,' said La Meilleraie, 'do not say too much against him before me, for the service he rendered me is still fresh.'

'Very good,' said the queen, 'be as grateful as you like, it does not implicate me; you are here safe and sound, that is all I wished for; you are not only welcome, but welcome back.'

'Yes, madame; but I only came back on one condition—that I would transmit to your majesty the will of the people.'

Chapter XLVII

The Riot

I was about eleven o'clock at night. Gondy had not walked a hundred steps ere he perceived the strange change which had been made in the streets of Paris.

The whole city seemed peopled with fantastic beings; silent shadows were seen unpaving the streets and others dragging and upsetting great wagons, whilst others again dug ditches large enough to engulf whole regiments of horsemen. These active beings flitted here and there like so many demons completing some unknown labour; these were the beggars of the Court of Miracles—the agents of the giver of holy water in the Square of Saint Eustache, preparing barricades for the morrow.

Gondy gazed on these deeds of darkness, on these nocturnal labourers, with a kind of fear; he asked himself, if, after having called forth these foul creatures from their dens, he should have the power of making them retire again. He felt almost inclined to cross himself when one of these beings happened to approach him. He reached the Rue Saint Honoré and went up it toward the Rue de la Ferronnerie; there the aspect changed; here it was the tradesmen who were running from shop to shop; their doors seemed closed like their shutters, but they were only pushed to in such a manner as to open and allow the men, who seemed fearful of showing what they carried, to enter, closing immediately. These men were shopkeepers, who had arms to lend to those who had none.

One individual went from door to door, bending under the weight of swords, guns, muskets and every kind of weapon, which he deposited as fast as he could. By the light of a lantern the coadjutor recognised Planchet.

‘The will!’ exclaimed the queen, frowning. ‘Oh! oh! monsieur maréchal, you must indeed have found yourself in wondrous peril to have undertaken so strange a commission!’

The irony with which these words were uttered did not escape the maréchal.

‘Pardon, madame,’ he said, ‘I am not a lawyer, I am a mere soldier, and probably, therefore, I do not quite comprehend the value of certain words; I ought to have said the wishes, and not the will, of the people. As for what you do me the honour to say, I presume you mean I was afraid?’

The queen smiled.

‘Well, then, madame, yes, I did feel fear; and though I have been through twelve pitched battles and I cannot count how many charges and skirmishes, I own for the third time in my life I was afraid. Yes, and I would rather face your majesty, however threatening your smile, than face those demons who accompanied me hither and who sprung from I know not whence, unless from deepest hell.’

‘Bravo,’ said D’Artagnan in a whisper to Porthos; ‘well answered.’

‘Well,’ said the queen, biting her lips, whilst her courtiers looked at each other with surprise, ‘what is the desire of my people?’

‘That Broussel shall be given up to them, madame.’

‘Never!’ said the queen, ‘never!’

‘Your majesty is mistress,’ said La Melleraye, retreating a few steps.

‘Where are you going, maréchal?’ asked the queen.

‘To give your majesty’s reply to those who await it.’

‘Stay, maréchal; I will not appear to parley with rebels.’

‘Madame, I have pledged my word, and unless you order me to be arrested I shall be forced to return.’

Anne of Austria’s eyes shot glances of fire.

‘Oh! that is no impediment, sir,’ said she; ‘I have had greater men than you arrested—Guitant!’

Mazarin sprang forward.

‘Madame,’ said he, ‘if I dared in my turn advise—’

‘Would it be to give up Broussel, sir? If so, you can spare yourself the trouble.’

‘No,’ said Mazarin; ‘although, perhaps, that counsel is as good as any other.’

‘Then what may it be?’

‘To call for monsieur le coadjuteur.’

‘The coadjutor!’ cried the queen, ‘that dreadful mischief maker! It is he who has raised all this revolt.’

‘The more reason,’ said Mazarin; ‘if he has raised it he can put it down.’

‘And hold, madame,’ suggested Comminges, who was near a window, out of which he could see; ‘hold, the moment is a happy one, for there he is now, giving his blessing in the square of the Palais Royal.’

The queen sprang to the window.

‘It is true,’ she said, ‘the arch hypocrite—see!’

‘I see,’ said Mazarin, ‘that everybody kneels before him, although he be but coadjutor, whilst I, were I in his place, though I am cardinal, should be torn to pieces. I persist, then, madame, in my wish’ (he laid an emphasis on the word), ‘that your majesty should receive the coadjutor.’

‘And wherefore do you not say, like the rest, your will?’ replied the queen, in a low voice.

Mazarin bowed.

‘Monsieur le maréchal,’ said the queen, after a moment’s reflection, ‘go and find the coadjutor and bring him to me.’

‘And what shall I say to the people?’

‘That they must have patience,’ said Anne, ‘as I have.’

The fiery Spanish woman spoke in a tone so imperative that the maréchal made no reply; he bowed and went out.

(D’Artagnan turned to Porthos. ‘How will this end?’ he said.

‘We shall soon see,’ said Porthos, in his tranquil way.)

In the meantime Anne of Austria approached Comminges and conversed with him in a subdued tone, whilst Mazarin glanced uneasily at the corner occupied by D’Artagnan and Porthos. Ere long the door opened and the maréchal entered, followed by the coadjutor.

‘There, madame,’ he said, ‘is Monsieur Gondy, who hastens to obey your majesty’s summons.’

The queen advanced a few steps to meet him, and then stopped, cold, severe, unmoved, with her lower lip scornfully protruded.

Gondy bowed respectfully.

‘Well, sir,’ said the queen, ‘what is your opinion of this riot?’

‘That it is no longer a riot, madame,’ he replied, ‘but a revolt.’

‘Adieu, your holiness,’ said the mendicant, opening the door and bending low before the prelate.

'Yes, but I make hereby a vow in your presence, to employ all that remains to me in pious works.'

His face was pale and drawn, like that of a man who had just undergone some inward struggle.

'Singular man!' muttered Gondy, taking his hat to go away; but on turning around he saw the beggar between him and the door. His first idea was that this man intended to do him some harm, but on the contrary he saw him fall on his knees before him with his hands clasped.

'Your blessing, your holiness, before you go, I beseech you!' he cried.

'Your holiness!' said Gondy; 'my friend, you take me for some one else.'

'No, your holiness, I take you for what you are, that is to say, the coadjutor; I recognised you at the first glance.'

Gondy smiled. 'And you want my blessing?' he said.

'Yes, I have need of it.'

The mendicant uttered these words in a tone of such humility, such earnest repentance, that Gondy placed his hand upon him and gave him his benediction with all the unction of which he was capable.

'Now,' said Gondy, 'there is a communion between us. I have blessed you and you are sacred to me. Come, have you committed some crime, pursued by human justice, from which I can protect you?'

The beggar shook his head. 'The crime which I have committed, my lord, has no call upon human justice, and you can only deliver me from it by blessing me frequently, as you have just done.'

'Come, be candid,' said the coadjutor, 'you have not all your life followed the trade which you do now?'

'No, my lord. I have pursued it for six years only.'

'And previously, where were you?'

'In the Bastille.'

'And before you went to the Bastille?'

'I will tell you, my lord, on the day when you are willing to hear my confession.'

'Good! At whatsoever hour of the day or night you may present yourself, remember that I shall be ready to give you absolution.'

'Thank you, my lord,' said the mendicant in a hoarse voice. 'But I am not yet ready to receive it.'

'Very well. Adieu.'

'The revolt is at the door of those who think my people can rebel,' cried Anne, unable to dissimulate before the coadjutor, whom she looked upon, and probably with reason, as the promoter of the tumult. 'Revolt! thus it is called by those who have wished for this demonstration and who are, perhaps, the cause of it; but, wait, wait! the king's authority will put all this to rights.'

'Was it to tell me that, madame,' coldly replied Gondy, 'that your majesty admitted me to the honour of entering your presence?'

'No, my dear coadjutor,' said Mazarin; 'it was to ask your advice in the unhappy dilemma in which we find ourselves.'

'Is it true,' asked Gondy, feigning astonishment, 'that her majesty summoned me to ask for my opinion?'

'Yes,' said the queen, 'it is requested.'

The coadjutor bowed.

'Your majesty wishes, then—'

'You to say what you would do in her place,' Mazarin hastened to reply. The coadjutor looked at the queen, who replied by a sign in the affirmative.

'Were I in her majesty's place,' said Gondy, coldly, 'I should not hesitate; I should release Broussel.'

'And if I do not give him up, what think you will be the result?' exclaimed the queen.

'I believe that not a stone in Paris will remain unturned,' put in the maréchal.

'It was not your opinion that I asked,' said the queen, sharply, without even turning around.

'If it is I whom your majesty interrogates,' replied the coadjutor in the same calm manner, 'I reply that I hold monsieur le maréchal's opinion in every respect.'

The colour mounted to the queen's face; her fine blue eyes seemed to start out of her head and her carmine lips, compared by all the poets of the day to a pomegranate in flower, were trembling with anger. Mazarin himself, who was well accustomed to the domestic outbreaks of this disturbed household, was alarmed.

'Give up Broussel!' she cried; 'fine counsel, indeed. Upon my word! one can easily see it comes from a priest.'

Gondy remained firm, and the abuse of the day seemed to glide over his head as the sarcasms of the evening before had done; but hatred and revenge were accumulating in his heart silently and drop by drop. He looked coldly at the queen, who nudged Mazarin to make him say something in his turn.

Mazarin, according to his custom, was thinking much and saying little.

‘Ho! ho!’ said he, ‘good advice, advice of a friend. I, too, would give up that good Monsieur Broussel, dead or alive, and all would be at an end.’

‘If you yield him dead, all will indeed be at an end, my lord, but quite otherwise than you mean.’

‘Did I say “dead or alive?”’ replied Mazarin. ‘It was only a way of speaking. You know I am not familiar with the French language, which you, monsieur le coadjuteur, both speak and write so well.’

‘(This is a council of state; D’Arragnan remarked to Porthos; ‘but we held better ones at La Rochelle, with Athos and Aramis.’

‘At the Saint Gervais bastion,’ said Porthos.

‘There and elsewhere.’)

The coadjutor let the storm pass over his head and resumed, still with the same tranquillity:

‘Madame, if the opinion I have submitted to you does not please you it is doubtless because you have better counsels to follow. I know too well the wisdom of the queen and that of her advisers to suppose that they will leave the capital long in trouble that may lead to a revolution.’

‘Thus, then, it is your opinion,’ said Anne of Austria, with a sneer and biting her lips with rage, ‘that yesterday’s riot, which to-day is already a rebellion, to-morrow may become a revolution?’

‘Yes, madame,’ replied the coadjutor, gravely.

‘But if I am to believe you, sir, the people seem to have thrown off all restraint.’

‘It is a bad year for kings,’ said Gondy, shaking his head; ‘look at England, madame.’

‘Yes; but fortunately we have no Oliver Cromwell in France,’ replied the queen.

‘Who knows?’ said Gondy; ‘such men are like thunderbolts—one recognises them only when they have struck.’

door, placed the light which he had brought with him in a corner of the wall, that the coadjutor might be able to find it on his return, and went down again. Although the key was in the door the coadjutor knocked.

‘Come in,’ said a voice which he recognised as that of the mendicant, whom he found lying on a kind of truckle bed. He rose on the entrance of the coadjutor, and at that moment ten o’clock struck.

‘Well,’ said Gondy, ‘have you kept your word with me?’

‘Not exactly,’ replied the mendicant.

‘How is that?’

‘You asked me for five hundred men, did you not? Well, I have ten thousand for you.’

‘You are not boasting?’

‘Do you wish for a proof?’

‘Yes.’

There were three candles alight, each of which burnt before a window, one looking upon the city, the other upon the Palais Royal, and a third upon the Rue Saint Denis.

The man went silently to each of the candles and blew them out one after the other.

‘What are you doing?’ asked the coadjutor.

‘I have given the signal.’

‘For what?’

‘For the barricades. When you leave this you will behold my men at work. Only take care you do not break your legs in stumbling over some chain or your neck by falling in a hole.’

‘Good! there is your money, the same sum as that you have received already. Now remember that you are a general and do not go and drink.’

‘For twenty years I have tasted nothing but water.’

The man took the bag from the hands of the coadjutor, who heard the sound of his fingers counting and handling the gold pieces.

‘Ah! ah!’ said the coadjutor, ‘you are avaricious, my good fellow.’

The mendicant sighed and threw down the bag.

‘Must I always be the same?’ said he, ‘and shall I never succeed in overcoming the old leaven? Oh, misery, oh, vanity!’

‘You take it, however.’