

Chapter XXXVI

Dream of Vengeance

HAT evening Milady gave orders that when M. D'Artagnan came as usual, he should be immediately admitted; but he did not come.

The next day Kitty went to see the young man again, and related to him all that had passed on the preceding evening. D'Artagnan smiled; this jealous anger of Milady was his revenge.

That evening Milady was still more impatient than on the preceding evening. She renewed the order relative to the Gascon; but as before she expected him in vain.

The next morning, when Kitty presented herself at D'Artagnan's, she was no longer joyous and alert as on the two preceding days; but on the contrary sad as death.

D'Artagnan asked the poor girl what was the matter with her; but she, as her only reply, drew a letter from her pocket and gave it to him.

This letter was in Milady's handwriting; only this time it was addressed to M. D'Artagnan, and not to M. de Wardes.

He opened it and read as follows:

Dear M. D'Artagnan,

It is wrong thus to neglect your friends, particularly at the moment you are about to leave them for so long a time. My brother-in-law and myself expected you yesterday and the day before, but in vain. Will it be the same this evening?

Your very grateful,

MILADY CLARK

‘That’s all very simple,’ said D’Aragnan; ‘I expected this letter. My credit rises by the fall of that of the Comte de Wardes.’

‘And will you go?’ asked Kitty.

‘Listen to me, my dear girl,’ said the Gascon, who sought for an excuse in his own eyes for breaking the promise he had made Athos; ‘you must understand it would be impolitic not to accept such a positive invitation. Milady, not seeing me come again, would not be able to understand what could cause the interruption of my visits, and might suspect something; who could say how far the vengeance of such a woman would go?’

‘Oh, my God!’ said Kitty, ‘you know how to represent things in such a way that you are always in the right. You are going now to pay your court to her again, and if this time you succeed in pleasing her in your own name and with your own face, it will be much worse than before.’

Instinct made poor Kitty guess a part of what was to happen. D’Aragnan reassured her as well as he could, and promised to remain insensible to the seductions of Milady.

He desired Kitty to tell her mistress that he could not be more grateful for her kindnesses than he was, and that he would be obedient to her orders. He did not dare to write for fear of not being able—to such experienced eyes as those of Milady—to disguise his writing sufficiently.

As nine o’clock sounded, D’Aragnan was at the Place Royale. It was evident that the servants who waited in the antechamber were warned, for as soon as D’Aragnan appeared, before even he had asked if Milady were visible, one of them ran to announce him.

‘Show him in,’ said Milady, in a quick tone, but so piercing that D’Aragnan heard her in the antechamber.

He was introduced.

‘I am at home to nobody,’ said Milady; ‘observe, to nobody.’

The servant went out.

D’Aragnan cast an inquiring glance at Milady. She was pale, and looked fatigued, either from tears or want of sleep. The number of lights had been intentionally diminished, but the young woman could not conceal the traces of the fever which had devoured her for two days.

D’Aragnan approached her with his usual gallantry. She then made an extraordinary effort to receive him, but never did a more distressed countenance give the lie to a more amiable smile.

quite a simple and natural affair, and the younger sons of the best families were frequently supported by their mistresses. D’Aragnan gave the open letter to Kitty, who at first was unable to comprehend it, but who became almost wild with joy on reading it a second time. She could scarcely believe in her happiness; and D’Aragnan was forced to renew with the living voice the assurances which he had written. And whatever might be—considering the violent character of Milady—the danger which the poor girl incurred in giving this billet to her mistress, she ran back to the Place Royale as fast as her legs could carry her.

The heart of the best woman is pitiless toward the sorrows of a rival.

Milady opened the letter with eagerness equal to Kitty’s in bringing it; but at the first words she read she became livid. She crushed the paper in her hand, and turning with flashing eyes upon Kitty, she cried, ‘What is this letter?’

‘The answer to Madame’s,’ replied Kitty, all in a tremble.

‘Impossible!’ cried Milady. ‘It is impossible a gentleman could have written such a letter to a woman.’ Then all at once, starting, she cried, ‘My God! can he have—’ and she stopped. She ground her teeth, she was of the colour of ashes. She tried to go toward the window for air, but she could only stretch forth her arms; her legs failed her, and she sank into an armchair. Kitty, fearing she was ill, hastened toward her and was beginning to open her dress; but Milady started up, pushing her away. ‘What do you want with me?’ said she, ‘and why do you place your hand on me?’

‘I thought that Madame was ill, and I wished to bring her help,’ responded the maid, frightened at the terrible expression which had come over her mistress’s face.

‘I faint? If I? Do you take me for half a woman? When I am insulted I do not faint, I avenge myself!’

And she made a sign for Kitty to leave the room.

'You are right,' said D'Artagnan; 'I will have done with her. I own that this woman terrifies me.'

'Shall you have the courage?' said Athos.

'I shall,' replied D'Artagnan, 'and instantly.'

'In truth, my young friend, you will act rightly,' said the gentleman, pressing the Gascon's hand with an affection almost paternal; 'and God grant that this woman, who has scarcely entered into your life, may not leave a terrible trace in it!' And Athos bowed to D'Artagnan like a man who wishes it understood that he would not be sorry to be left alone with his thoughts.

On reaching home D'Artagnan found Kitty waiting for him. A month of fever could not have changed her more than this one night of sleeplessness and sorrow.

She was sent by her mistress to the false De Wardes. Her mistress was mad with love, intoxicated with joy. She wished to know when her lover would meet her a second night; and poor Kitty, pale and trembling, awaited D'Artagnan's reply. The counsels of his friend, joined to the cries of his own heart, made him determine, now his pride was saved and his vengeance satisfied, not to see Milady again. As a reply, he wrote the following letter:

Do not depend upon me, madame, for the next meeting. Since my convalescence I have so many affairs of this kind on my hands that I am forced to regulate them a little. When your turn comes, I shall have the honour to inform you of it. I kiss your hands.

COMTE DE WARDES

Not a word about the sapphire. Was the Gascon determined to keep it as a weapon against Milady, or else, let us be frank, did he not reserve the sapphire as a last resource for his outfit? It would be wrong to judge the actions of one period from the point of view of another. That which would now be considered as disgraceful to a gentleman was at that time

To the questions which D'Artagnan put concerning her health, she replied, 'Bad, very bad.'

'Then,' replied he, 'my visit is ill-timed; you, no doubt, stand in need of repose, and I will withdraw.'

'No, no!' said Milady. 'On the contrary, stay, Monsieur D'Artagnan; your agreeable company will divert me.'

'Oh, oh!' thought D'Artagnan. 'She has never been so kind before. On guard!'

Milady assumed the most agreeable air possible, and conversed with more than her usual brilliancy. At the same time the fever, which for an instant abandoned her, returned to give lustre to her eyes, colour to her cheeks, and vermillion to her lips. D'Artagnan was again in the presence of the Circe who had before surrounded him with her enchantments. His love, which he believed to be extinct but which was only asleep, awoke again in his heart. Milady smiled, and D'Artagnan felt that he could damn himself for that smile. There was a moment at which he felt something like remorse.

By degrees, Milady became more communicative. She asked D'Artagnan if he had a mistress.

'Alas!' said D'Artagnan, with the most sentimental air he could assume, 'can you be cruel enough to put such a question to me—to me, who, from the moment I saw you, have only breathed and sighed through you and for you?'

Milady smiled with a strange smile.

'Then you love me?' said she.

'Have I any need to tell you so? Have you not perceived it?'

'It may be; but you know the more hearts are worth the capture, the more difficult they are to be won.'

'Oh, difficulties do not affright me,' said D'Artagnan. 'I shrink before nothing but impossibilities.'

'Nothing is impossible,' replied Milady, 'to true love.'

'Nothing, madame?'

'Nothing,' replied Milady.

'The devil!' thought D'Artagnan. 'The note is changed. Is she going to fall in love with me, by chance, this fair inconstant; and will she be disposed to give me myself another sapphire like that which she gave me for De Wardes?

D'Aragnan rapidly drew his seat nearer to Milady's.

'Well, now,' she said, 'let us see what you would do to prove this love of which you speak.'

'All that could be required of me. Order; I am ready.'

'For everything?'

'For everything,' cried D'Aragnan, who knew beforehand that he had not much to risk in engaging himself thus.

'Well, now let us talk a little seriously,' said Milady, in her turn drawing her armchair nearer to D'Aragnan's chair.

'I am all attention, madame,' said he.

Milady remained thoughtful and undecided for a moment; then, as if appearing to have formed a resolution, she said, 'I have an enemy.'

'You, madame!' said D'Aragnan, affecting surprise; 'is that possible, my God?—good and beautiful as you are!'

'A mortal enemy.'

'Indeed!'

'An enemy who has insulted me so cruelly that between him and me it is war to the death. May I reckon on you as an auxiliary?'

D'Aragnan at once perceived the ground which the vindictive creature wished to reach.

'You may, madame,' said he, with emphasis. 'My arm and my life belong to you, like my love.'

'Then,' said Milady, 'since you are as generous as you are loving—'

She stopped.

'Well?' demanded D'Aragnan.

'Well,' replied Milady, after a moment of silence, 'from the present time, cease to talk of impossibilities.'

'Do not overwhelm me with happiness,' cried D'Aragnan, throwing himself on his knees, and covering with kisses the hands abandoned to him.

'Avenge me of that infamous De Wardes,' said Milady, between her teeth, 'and I shall soon know how to get rid of you—you double idiot, you animated sword blade!'

'That ring comes from Milady?' cried Athos, with a voice in which it was easy to detect strong emotion.

'Her very self; she gave it me last night. Here it is,' replied D'Aragnan, taking it from his finger.

Athos examined it and became very pale. He tried it on his left hand; it fit his finger as if made for it.

A shade of anger and vengeance passed across the usually calm brow of this gentleman.

'It is impossible it can be she,' said he. 'How could this ring come into the hands of Milady Clark? And yet it is difficult to suppose such a resemblance should exist between two jewels.'

'Do you know this ring?' said D'Aragnan.

'I thought I did,' replied Athos; 'but no doubt I was mistaken.' And he returned D'Aragnan the ring without, however, ceasing to look at it.

'Pray, D'Aragnan,' said Athos, after a minute, 'either take off that ring or turn the mounting inside; it recalls such cruel recollections that I shall have no head to converse with you. Don't ask me for counsel; don't tell me you are perplexed what to do. But stop! let me look at that sapphire again; the one I mentioned to you had one of its faces scratched by accident.'

D'Aragnan took off the ring, giving it again to Athos.

Athos started. 'Look,' said he, 'is it not strange?' and he pointed out to D'Aragnan the scratch he had remembered.

'But from whom did this ring come to you, Athos?'

'From my mother, who inherited it from her mother. As I told you, it is an old family jewel.'

'And you—sold it?' asked D'Aragnan, hesitatingly.

'No,' replied Athos, with a singular smile. 'I gave it away in a night of love, as it has been given to you.'

D'Aragnan became pensive in his turn; it appeared as if there were abysses in Milady's soul whose depths were dark and unknown. He took back the ring, but put it in his pocket and not on his finger.

'D'Aragnan,' said Athos, taking his hand, 'you know I love you; if I had a son I could not love him better. Take my advice, renounce this woman. I do not know her, but a sort of intuition tells me she is a lost creature, and that there is something fatal about her.'

‘Yes, much,’ said D’Artagnan, who did not well know how to answer. ‘Be tranquil,’ murmured Milady; ‘I will avenge you—and cruelly!’

‘Peste!’ said D’Artagnan to himself, ‘the moment for confidences has not yet come.’

It took some time for D’Artagnan to resume this little dialogue; but then all the ideas of vengeance which he had brought with him had completely vanished. This woman exercised over him an unaccountable power; he hated and adored her at the same time. He would not have believed that two sentiments so opposite could dwell in the same heart, and by their union constitute a passion so strange, and as it were, diabolical.

Presently it sounded one o’clock. It was necessary to separate. D’Artagnan at the moment of quitting Milady felt only the liveliest regret at the parting; and as they addressed each other in a reciprocally passionate adieu, another interview was arranged for the following week.

Poor Kitty hoped to speak a few words to D’Artagnan when he passed through her chamber; but Milady herself reconducted him through the darkness, and only quit him at the staircase.

The next morning D’Artagnan ran to find Athos. He was engaged in an adventure so singular that he wished for counsel. He therefore told him all.

‘Your Milady,’ said he, ‘appears to be an infamous creature, but not the less you have done wrong to deceive her. In one fashion or another you have a terrible enemy on your hands.’

While thus speaking Athos regarded with attention the sapphire set with diamonds which had taken, on D’Artagnan’s finger, the place of the queen’s ring, carefully kept in a casket.

‘You notice my ring?’ said the Gascon, proud to display so rich a gift in the eyes of his friends.

‘Yes,’ said Athos, ‘it reminds me of a family jewel.’

‘It is beautiful, is it not?’ said D’Artagnan.

‘Yes,’ said Athos, ‘magnificent. I did not think two sapphires of such a fine water existed. Have you traded it for your diamond?’

‘No. It is a gift from my beautiful Englishwoman, or rather Frenchwoman—for I am convinced she was born in France, though I have not questioned her.’

‘Fall voluntarily into my arms, hypocritical and dangerous woman,’ said D’Artagnan, likewise to himself, ‘after having abused me with such effrontery, and afterward I will laugh at you with him whom you wish me to kill.’

D’Artagnan lifted up his head.

‘I am ready,’ said he.

‘You have understood me, then, dear Monsieur D’Artagnan,’ said Milady.

‘I could interpret one of your looks.’

‘Then you would employ for me your arm which has already acquired so much renown?’

‘Instantly!’

‘But on my part,’ said Milady, ‘how should I repay such a service? I know these lovers. They are men who do nothing for nothing.’

‘You know the only reply that I desire,’ said D’Artagnan, ‘the only one worthy of you and of me!’

And he drew nearer to her.

She scarcely resisted.

‘Interested man!’ cried she, smiling.

‘Ah,’ cried D’Artagnan, really carried away by the passion this woman had the power to kindle in his heart, ‘ah, that is because my happiness appears so impossible to me; and I have such fear that it should fly away from me like a dream that I pant to make a reality of it.’

‘Well, merit this pretended happiness, then!’

‘I am at your orders,’ said D’Artagnan.

‘Quite certain?’ said Milady, with a last doubt.

‘Only name to me the base man that has brought tears into your beautiful eyes!’

‘Who told you that I had been weeping?’ said she.

‘It appeared to me—’

‘Such women as I never weep,’ said Milady.

‘So much the better! Come, tell me his name!’

‘Remember that his name is all my secret.’

‘Yet I must know his name.’

‘Yes, you must; see what confidence I have in you!’

‘You overwhelm me with joy. What is his name?’

'You know him.'

'Indeed.'

'Yes.'

'It is surely not one of my friends?' replied D'Arragnan, affecting hesitation in order to make her believe him ignorant.

'If it were one of your friends you would hesitate, then?' cried Milady; and a threatening glance darted from her eyes.

'Not if it were my own brother!' cried D'Arragnan, as if carried away by his enthusiasm.

Our Gascon promised this without risk, for he knew all that was meant.

'I love your devotedness,' said Milady.

'Alas, do you love nothing else in me?' asked D'Arragnan.

'I love you also, you!' said she, taking his hand.

The warm pressure made D'Arragnan tremble, as if by the touch that fever which consumed Milady attacked himself.

'You love me, you!' cried he. 'Oh, if that were so, I should lose my reason!'

And he folded her in his arms. She made no effort to remove her lips from his kisses; only she did not respond to them. Her lips were cold; it appeared to D'Arragnan that he had embraced a statue.

He was not the less intoxicated with joy, electrified by love. He almost believed in the tenderness of Milady; he almost believed in the crime of De Wardes. If De Wardes had at that moment been under his hand, he would have killed him.

Milady seized the occasion.

'His name is—' said she, in her turn.

'De Wardes; I know it,' cried D'Arragnan.

'And how do you know it?' asked Milady, seizing both his hands, and endeavouring to read with her eyes to the bottom of his heart.

D'Arragnan felt he had allowed himself to be carried away, and that he had committed an error.

'Tell me, tell me, tell me, I say,' repeated Milady, 'how do you know it?'

'How do I know it?' said D'Arragnan.

'Yes.'

'I know it because yesterday Monsieur de Wardes, in a saloon where I was, showed a ring which he said he had received from you.'

Kitty's detention was not long. Hardly had D'Arragnan seen, through a crevice in his closet, that the whole apartment was in obscurity, than he slipped out of his concealment, at the very moment when Kitty reclosed the door of communication.

'What is that noise?' demanded Milady.

'It is I,' said D'Arragnan in a subdued voice, 'I, the Comte de Wardes.'

'Oh, my God, my God!' murmured Kitty, 'he has not even waited for the hour he himself named!'

'Well,' said Milady, in a trembling voice, 'why do you not enter? Count, Count, added she, 'you know that I wait for you.'

At this appeal D'Arragnan drew Kitty quietly away, and slipped into the chamber.

If rage or sorrow ever torture the heart, it is when a lover receives under a name which is not his own protestations of love addressed to his happy rival. D'Arragnan was in a dolorous situation which he had not foreseen. Jealousy gnawed his heart; and he suffered almost as much as poor Kitty, who at that very moment was crying in the next chamber.

'Yes, Count,' said Milady, in her softest voice, and pressing his hand in her own, 'I am happy in the love which your looks and your words have expressed to me every time we have met. I also—I love you. Oh, tomorrow, tomorrow, I must have some pledge from you which will prove that you think of me; and that you may not forget me, take this!' and she slipped a ring from her finger onto D'Arragnan's. D'Arragnan remembered having seen this ring on the finger of Milady; it was a magnificent sapphire, encircled with brilliants.

The first movement of D'Arragnan was to return it, but Milady added, 'No, no! Keep that ring for love of me. Besides, in accepting it,' she added, in a voice full of emotion, 'you render me a much greater service than you imagine.'

'This woman is full of mysteries,' murmured D'Arragnan to himself. At that instant he felt himself ready to reveal all. He even opened his mouth to tell Milady who he was, and with what a revengeful purpose he had come; but she added, 'Poor angel, whom that monster of a Gascon barely failed to kill.'

The monster was himself.

'Oh,' continued Milady, 'do your wounds still make you suffer?'

heard him enter, but she did not raise her head. The young man went to her and took her hands; then she sobbed aloud.

As D'Arragnan had presumed, on receiving his letter, Milady in a delirium of joy had told her servant everything; and by way of recompense for the manner in which she had this time executed the commission, she had given Kitty a purse.

Returning to her own room, Kitty had thrown the purse into a corner, where it lay open, disgorging three or four gold pieces on the carpet. The poor girl, under the caresses of D'Arragnan, lifted her head. D'Arragnan himself was frightened by the change in her countenance. She joined her hands with a suppliant air, but without venturing to speak a word. As little sensitive as was the heart of D'Arragnan, he was touched by this mute sorrow; but he held too tenaciously to his projects, above all to this one, to change the program which he had laid out in advance. He did not therefore allow her any hope that he would flinch; only he represented his action as one of simple vengeance.

For the rest this vengeance was very easy; for Milady, doubtless to conceal her blushes from her lover, had ordered Kitty to extinguish all the lights in the apartment, and even in the little chamber itself. Before daybreak M. de Wardes must take his departure, still in obscurity.

Presently they heard Milady retire to her room. D'Arragnan slipped into the wardrobe. Hardly was he concealed when the little bell sounded. Kitty went to her mistress, and did not leave the door open; but the partition was so thin that one could hear nearly all that passed between the two women.

Milady seemed overcome with joy, and made Kitty repeat the smallest details of the pretended interview of the soubrette with De Wardes when he received the letter; how he had responded; what was the expression of his face; if he seemed very amorous. And to all these questions poor Kitty, forced to put on a pleasant face, responded in a stifled voice whose dolorous accent her mistress did not however remark, solely because happiness is egotistical.

Finally, as the hour for her interview with the count approached, Milady had everything about her darkened, and ordered Kitty to return to her own chamber, and introduce De Wardes whenever he presented himself.

'Wretch!' cried Milady.

The epithet, as may be easily understood, resounded to the very bottom of D'Arragnan's heart.

'Well?' continued she.

'Well, I will avenge you of this wretch,' replied D'Arragnan, giving himself the airs of Don Japhet of Armenia.

'Thanks, my brave friend!' cried Milady; 'and when shall I be avenged?'

'Tomorrow—immediately—when you please!'

Milady was about to cry out, 'Immediately,' but she reflected that such precipitation would not be very gracious toward D'Arragnan.

Besides, she had a thousand precautions to take, a thousand counsels to give to her defender, in order that he might avoid explanations with the count before witnesses. All this was answered by an expression of D'Arragnan's. 'Tomorrow,' said he, 'you will be avenged, or I shall be dead.'

'No,' said she, 'you will avenge me; but you will not be dead. He is a coward.'

'With women, perhaps; but not with men. I know something of him.'

'But it seems you had not much reason to complain of your fortune in your contest with him.'

'Fortune is a courtesan; favourable yesterday, she may turn her back tomorrow.'

'Which means that you now hesitate?'

'No, I do not hesitate; God forbid! But would it be just to allow me to go to a possible death without having given me at least something more than hope?'

Milady answered by a glance which said, 'Is that all?—speak, then.' And then accompanying the glance with explanatory words, 'That is but too just,' said she, tenderly.

'Oh, you are an angel!' exclaimed the young man.

'Then all is agreed?' said she.

'Except that which I ask of you, dear love.'

'But when I assure you that you may rely on my tenderness?'

'I cannot wait till tomorrow.'

'Silence! I hear my brother. It will be useless for him to find you here.' She rang the bell and Kitty appeared.

‘Go out this way,’ said she, opening a small private door, ‘and come back at eleven o’clock; we will then terminate this conversation. Kitty will conduct you to my chamber.’

The poor girl almost fainted at hearing these words.

‘Well, mademoiselle, what are you thinking about, standing there like a statue? Do as I bid you: show the chevalier out; and this evening at eleven o’clock—you have heard what I said.’

‘It appears that these appointments are all made for eleven o’clock,’ thought D’Artagnan; ‘that’s a settled custom.’

Milady held out her hand to him, which he kissed tenderly.

‘But,’ said he, as he retired as quickly as possible from the reproaches of Kitty, ‘I must not play the fool. This woman is certainly a great liar. I must take care.’

Chapter XXXV

A Gascon a Match For Cupid

HE evening so impatiently waited for by Porthos and by D’Artagnan at last arrived.

As was his custom, D’Artagnan presented himself at Milady’s at about nine o’clock. He found her in a charming humour. Never had he been so well received. Our Gascon knew, by the first glance of his eye, that his billet had been delivered, and that this billet had had its effect.

Kitty entered to bring some sherbet. Her mistress put on a charming face, and smiled on her graciously; but alas! the poor girl was so sad that she did not even notice Milady’s condescension.

D’Artagnan looked at the two women, one after the other, and was forced to acknowledge that in his opinion Dame Nature had made a mistake in their formation. To the great lady she had given a heart vile and venal; to the soubrette she had given the heart of a duchess.

At ten o’clock Milady began to appear restless. D’Artagnan knew what she wanted. She looked at the clock, rose, resetted herself, smiled at D’Artagnan with an air which said, ‘You are very amiable, no doubt, but you would be charming if you would only depart.’

D’Artagnan rose and took his hat; Milady gave him her hand to kiss. The young man felt her press his hand, and comprehended that this was a sentiment, not of coquetry, but of gratitude because of his departure.

‘She loves him devilishly,’ he murmured. Then he went out.

This time Kitty was nowhere waiting for him; neither in the antechamber, nor in the corridor, nor beneath the great door. It was necessary that D’Artagnan should find alone the staircase and the little chamber. She

Chapter XXXVII

Milady's Secret

D'ARTAGNAN left the hôtel instead of going up at once to Kitty's chamber, as she endeavoured to persuade him to do—and that for two reasons: the first, because by this means he should escape reproaches, recriminations, and prayers; the second, because he was not sorry to have an opportunity of reading his own thoughts and endeavouring, if possible, to fathom those of this woman.

What was most clear in the matter was that D'Artagnan loved Milady like a madman, and that she did not love him at all. In an instant D'Artagnan perceived that the best way in which he could act would be to go home and write Milady a long letter, in which he would confess to her that he and De Wardes were, up to the present moment absolutely the same, and that consequently he could not undertake, without committing suicide, to kill the Comte de Wardes. But he also was spurred on by a ferocious desire of vengeance. He wished to subdue this woman in his own name; and as this vengeance appeared to him to have a certain sweetness in it, he could not make up his mind to renounce it.

He walked six or seven times round the Place Royale, turning at every ten steps to look at the light in Milady's apartment, which was to be seen through the blinds. It was evident that this time the young woman was not in such haste to retire to her apartment as she had been the first.

At length the light disappeared. With this light was extinguished the last irresolution in the heart of D'Artagnan. He recalled to his mind the details of the first night, and with a beating heart and a brain on fire he re-entered the hôtel and flew toward Kitty's chamber.

The poor girl, pale as death and trembling in all her limbs, wished to delay her lover; but Milady, with her ear on the watch, had heard the noise D'Artagnan had made, and opening the door, said, 'Come in.'

All this was of such incredible immodesty, of such monstrous effrontery, that D'Artagnan could scarcely believe what he saw or what he heard. He imagined himself to be drawn into one of those fantastic intrigues one meets in dreams. He, however, darted not the less quickly toward Milady, yielding to that magnetic attraction which the loadstone exercises over iron.

As the door closed after them Kitty rushed toward it. Jealousy, fury, offended pride, all the passions in short that dispute the heart of an outraged woman in love, urged her to make a revelation; but she reflected that she would be totally lost if she confessed having assisted in such a machination, and above all, that D'Artagnan would also be lost to her forever. This last thought of love counselled her to make this last sacrifice.

D'Artagnan, on his part, had gained the summit of all his wishes. It was no longer a rival who was beloved; it was himself who was apparently beloved. A secret voice whispered to him, at the bottom of his heart, that he was but an instrument of vengeance, that he was only caressed till he had given death; but pride, but self-love, but madness silenced this voice and stifled its murmurs. And then our Gascon, with that large quantity of conceit which we know he possessed, compared himself with De Wardes, and asked himself why, after all, he should not be beloved for himself?

He was absorbed entirely by the sensations of the moment. Milady was no longer for him that woman of fatal intentions who had for a moment terrified him; she was an ardent, passionate mistress, abandoning herself to love which she also seemed to feel. Two hours thus glided away. When the transports of the two lovers were calmer, Milady, who had not the same motives for forgetfulness that D'Artagnan had, was the first to return to reality, and asked the young man if the means which were on the morrow to bring on the encounter between him and De Wardes were already arranged in his mind.

But D'Artagnan, whose ideas had taken quite another course, forgot himself like a fool, and answered gallantly that it was too late to think about duels and sword thrusts.

'In good time. Now you talk, my dear.'
'You pardon me?'

'We shall see,' said Porthos, majestically; and the two separated saying, 'Till this evening.'

'The devil!' thought Porthos, as he walked away, 'it appears I am getting nearer to Monsieur Coquenard's strongbox at last.'