

way. He encamped at Barnet, that is to say, within four leagues of the capital, cherished by the parliament, which thought it beheld in him a protector, and awaited by the people, who were anxious to see him reveal himself, that they might judge him. D'Artagnan himself had not been able to fathom his tactics; he observed—he admired. Monk could not enter London with a settled determination without bringing about civil war. He temporized for a short time.

Suddenly, when least expected, Monk drove the military party out of London, and installed himself in the city amidst the citizens, by order of the parliament; then, at the moment when the citizens were crying out against Monk—at the moment when the soldiers themselves were accusing their leader—Monk, finding himself certain of a majority, declared to the Rump Parliament that it must abdicate—be dissolved—and yield its place to a government which would not be a joke. Monk pronounced this declaration, supported by fifty thousand swords, to which, that same evening, were united, with shouts of delirious joy, the five thousand inhabitants of the good city of London. At length, at the moment when the people, after their triumphs and festive repasts in the open streets, were looking about for a master, it was affirmed that a vessel had left the Hague, bearing King Charles II and his fortunes.

'Gentlemen,' said Monk to his officers, 'I am going to meet the legitimate king. He who loves me will follow me.' A burst of acclamations welcomed these words, which D'Artagnan did not hear without the greatest delight.

'Mordieu!' said he to Monk, 'that is bold, monsieur.'

'You will accompany me, will you not?' said Monk.

'Pardieu! general. But tell me, I beg, what you wrote by Athos, that is to say, the Comte de la Fère—you know—the day of our arrival?'

'I have no secrets from you now,' replied Monk. 'I wrote these words: "Sire, I expect your majesty in six weeks at Dover."'

'Ah!' said D'Artagnan, 'I no longer say it is bold; I say it is well played; it is a fine stroke!'

'You are something of a judge in such matters,' replied Monk.

And this was the only time the general had ever made an allusion to his voyage to Holland.

Chapter XXXII

Athos and D'Artagnan Meet Once More at the Hostelry of the 'Corne du Cerf'

HE king of England made his entrée into Dover with great pomp, as he afterwards did in London. He had sent for his brothers; he had brought over his mother and sister. England had been for so long a time given up to herself—that is to say, to tyranny, mediocrity and nonsense—that this return of Charles II, whom the English only knew as the son of the man whose head they had cut off, was a festival for three kingdoms. Consequently, all the good wishes, all the acclamations which accompanied his return, struck the young king so forcibly that he stooped and whispered in the ear of James of York, his younger brother, 'In truth, James, it seems to have been our own fault that we were so long absent from a country where we are so much beloved!' The pageant was magnificent. Beautiful weather favoured the solemnity. Charles had regained all his youth, all his good humour; he appeared to be transfigured; hearts seemed to smile on him like the sun. Amongst this noisy crowd of courtiers and worshippers, who did not appear to remember they had conducted to the scaffold at Whitehall the father of the new king, a man, in the garb of a lieutenant of musketeers, looked, with a smile upon his thin, intellectual lips, sometimes at the people vociferating their blessings, and sometimes at the prince, who pretended emotion, and who bowed most particularly to the women, whose bouquets fell beneath his horse's feet.

‘What a fine trade is that of king!’ said this man, so completely absorbed in contemplation that he stopped in the middle of the road, leaving the cortège to file past. ‘Now, there is, in good truth, a prince all bespangled over with gold and diamonds, enamelled with flowers like a spring meadow; he is about to plunge his empty hands into the immense coffers in which his now faithful—but so lately unfaithful—subjects have amassed one or two cartloads of ingots of gold. They cast bouquets enough upon him to smother him; and yet, if he had presented himself to them two months ago, they would have sent as many bullets and balls at him as they now throw flowers. Decidedly it is worth something to be born in a certain sphere, with due respect to the lowly, who pretend that it is of very little advantage to them to be born lowly.’ The cortège continued to file on, and, with the king, the acclamations began to die away in the direction of the palace, which, however, did not prevent our officer from being pushed about.

‘Mordieu!’ continued the reasoner, ‘these people tread upon my toes and look upon me as of very little consequence, or rather of none at all, seeing that they are Englishmen and I am a Frenchman. If all these people were asked,—“Who is M. d’Arragan?” they would reply, “Nescio vos.” But let any one say to them, “There is the king going by,” “There is M. Monk going by,” they would run away, shouting,—“Vive le roi!” “Vive M. Monk!” till their lungs were exhausted. And yet,’ continued he, surveying, with that look sometimes so keen and sometimes so proud, the diminishing crowd,—‘and yet, reflect a little, my good people, on what your king has done, on what M. Monk has done, and then think what has been done by this poor unknown, who is called M. d’Arragan! It is true you do not know him, since he is here unknown, and that prevents your thinking about the matter! But, bah! what matters it! All that does not prevent Charles II from being a great king, although he has been exiled twelve years, or M. Monk from being a great captain, although he did make a voyage to Holland in a box. Well, then, since it is admitted that one is a great king and the other a great captain,—“Hurrah for King Charles II!”—“Hurrah for General Monk!” And his voice mingled with the voices of the hundreds of spectators, over which it sounded for a moment. Then, the better to play the devoted man, he took off his hat and waved profession of faith from his rival. The latter declared he had no other opinion than that of the majority. Lambert asked if it would not be more expedient to terminate the quarrel by an alliance than by a battle. Monk hereupon demanded a week for consideration. Now, Lambert could not refuse this: and Lambert, nevertheless, had come saying that he should devour Monk’s army. Therefore, at the end of the interview, which Lambert’s party watched with impatience, nothing was decided—neither treaty nor battle—the rebel army, as M. d’Arragan had foreseen, began to prefer the good cause to the bad one, and the parliament, rumpled as it was, to the pompous nothings of Lambert’s designs.

They remembered, likewise, the good feasts of London—the profusion of ale and sherry with which the citizens of London paid their friends the soldiers—they looked with terror at the black war bread, at the troubled waters of the Tweed,—too salt for the glass, not enough so for the pot; and they said to themselves, ‘Are not the roast meats kept warm for Monk in London?’ From that time nothing was heard of but desertion in Lambert’s army. The soldiers allowed themselves to be drawn away by the force of principles, which are, like discipline, the obligatory tie in everybody constituted for any purpose. Monk defended the parliament—Lambert attacked it. Monk had no more inclination to support parliament than Lambert, but he had it inscribed on his standards, so that all those of the contrary party were reduced to write upon theirs, ‘Rebellion,’ which sounded ill to puritan ears. They flocked, then, from Lambert to Monk, as sinners flock from Baal to God.

Monk made his calculations; at a thousand desertions a day Lambert had men enough to last twenty days; but there is in sinking things such a growth of weight and swiftness, which combine with each other, that a hundred left the first day, five hundred the second, a thousand the third. Monk thought he had obtained his rate. But from one thousand the deserters increased to two thousand, then to four thousand, and, a week after, Lambert, perceiving that he had no longer the possibility of accepting battle, if it were offered to him, took the wise resolution of decamping during the night, returning to London, and being beforehand with Monk in constructing a power with the wreck of the military party.

But Monk, free and without uneasiness, marched towards London as a conqueror, augmenting his army with all the floating parties on the

The officer made no reply; and Monk, having imposed silence on his people, all remained persuaded that he had accomplished some important work or made some important trial. This was forming a very poor conception of his patience and scrupulous genius. Monk, if he had the good faith of the Puritans, his allies, must have returned fervent thanks to the patron saint who had taken him from the box of M. d'Artagnan. Whilst these things were going on, our musketeer could not help constantly repeating,—

‘God grant that M. Monk may not have as much pride as I have; for I declare that if any one had put me into a coffer with that grating over my mouth, and carried me packed up, like a calf, across the seas, I should cherish such a memory of my piteous looks in that coffer, and such an ugly animosity against him who had inclosed me in it, I should dread so greatly to see a sarcastic smile blooming upon the face of the malicious wretch, or in his attitude any grotesque imitation of my position in the box, that, Mordieux! I should plunge a good dagger into his throat in compensation for the grating; and would nail him down in a veritable bier, in remembrance of the false coffin in which I had been left in to grow mouldy for two days.’

And D'Artagnan spoke honestly when he spoke thus; for the skin of our Gascon was a very thin one. Monk, fortunately, entertained other ideas. He never opened his mouth to his timid conqueror concerning the past; but he admitted him very near to his person in his labours, took him with him to several reconnoiterings, in such a way as to obtain that which he evidently warmly desired,—a rehabilitation in the mind of D'Artagnan. The latter conducted himself like a past-master in the art of flattery: he admired all Monk's tactics, and the ordering of his camp; he joked very pleasantly upon the circumvallations of Lambert's camp, who had, he said, very uselessly given himself the trouble to inclose a camp for twenty thousand men, whilst an acre of ground would have been quite sufficient for the corporal and fifty guards who would perhaps remain faithful to him.

Monk, immediately after his arrival, had accepted the proposition made by Lambert the evening before, for an interview, and which Monk's lieutenants had refused under the pretext that the general was indisposed. This interview was neither long nor interesting: Lambert demanded a it in the air. Some one seized his arm in the very height of his expansive loyalism. (In 1660 that was so termed which we now call royalism.)

‘Athos!’ cried D'Artagnan, ‘you here!’ And the two friends seized each other's hands.

‘You here!—and being here,’ continued the musketeer, ‘you are not in the midst of all these courtiers, my dear comte! What! you, the hero of the fête, you are not prancing on the left hand of the king, as M. Monk is prancing on the right? In truth, I cannot comprehend your character, nor that of the prince who owes you so much!’

‘Always scornful, my dear D'Artagnan!’ said Athos. ‘Will you never correct yourself of that vile habit?’

‘But you do not form part of the pageant?’

‘I do not, because I was not willing to do so.’

‘And why were you not willing?’

‘Because I am neither envoy nor ambassador, nor representative of the king of France; and it does not become me to exhibit myself thus near the person of another king than the one God has given me for a master.’

‘Mordieux! you came very near to the person of the king, his father.’

‘That was another thing, my friend; he was about to die.’

‘And yet that which you did for him—’

‘I did it because it was my duty to do it. But you know I have all ostentation. Let King Charles II, then, who no longer stands in need of me, leave me to my rest, and the shadow; that is all I claim of him.’

D'Artagnan sighed.

‘What is the matter with you?’ said Athos. ‘One would say that this happy return of the king to London saddens you, my friend; you who have done at least as much for his majesty as I have.’

‘Have I not,’ replied D'Artagnan, with his Gascon laugh, ‘have I not done much for his majesty, without any one suspecting it?’

‘Yes, yes, but the king is well aware of it, my friend,’ cried Athos.

‘He is aware of it!’ said the musketeer bitterly. ‘By my faith! I did not suspect so, and I was even a moment ago trying to forget it myself.’

‘But he, my friend, will not forget it, I will answer for him.’

‘You tell me that to console me a little, Athos.’

‘For what?’

‘Mordiaux! for all the expense I incurred. I have ruined myself, my friend, ruined myself for the restoration of this young prince who has just passed, cantering on his isabella coloured horse.’

‘The king does not know you have ruined yourself, my friend; but he knows he owes you much.’

‘And say, Athos, does that advance me in any respect? for, to do you justice, you have laboured nobly. But I—I who in appearance marred your combinations, it was I who really made them succeed. Follow my calculations closely; you might not have, by persuasions or mildness, convinced General Monk, whilst I so roughly treated this dear general, that I furnished your prince with an opportunity of showing himself generous: this generosity was inspired in him by the fact of my fortunate mistake, and Charles is paid by the restoration which Monk has brought about.’

‘All that, my dear friend, is strikingly true,’ replied Athos.

‘Well, strikingly true as it may be, it is not less true, my friend, that I shall return—greatly beloved by M. Monk, who calls me dear captain all day long, although I am neither dear to him nor a captain;—and much appreciated by the king, who has already forgotten my name;—it is not less true, I say, that I shall return to my beautiful country, cursed by the soldiers I had raised with the hopes of large pay, cursed by the brave Planchet, of who I have borrowed a part of his fortune.’

‘How is that? What the devil had Planchet to do in all this?’

‘Ah, yes, my friend; but this king, so spruce, so smiling, so adored, M. Monk fancies he has recalled him, you fancy you have supported him, I fancy I have brought him back, the people fancy they have reconquered him, he himself fancies he has negotiated his restoration; and yet nothing of all this is true, for Charles II, king of England, Scotland, and Ireland, has been replaced upon the throne by a French grocer, who lives in the Rue des Lombards, and is named Planchet. And such is grandeur! “Vanity!” says the Scripture: “vanity, all is vanity.”’

Athos could not help laughing at this whimsical outbreak of his friend. ‘My dear D’Artagnan,’ said he, pressing his hand affectionately, ‘should you not exercise a little more philosophy? Is it not some further satisfaction to you to have saved my life as you did by arriving so fortunately with Monk, when those damned parliamentarians wanted to burn me alive?’

Chapter XXXI

Monk reveals Himself

D’ARTAGNAN, although he flattered himself with better success, had, nevertheless, not too well comprehended his situation. It was a strange and grave subject for him to reflect upon—this voyage of Athos into England; this league of the king with Athos, and that extraordinary combination of his design with that of the Comte de la Fère. The best way was to let things follow their own train. An imprudence had been committed, and, whilst having succeeded, as he had promised, D’Artagnan found that he had gained no advantage by his success. Since everything was lost, he could risk no more.

D’Artagnan followed Monk through his camp. The return of the general had produced a marvellous effect, for his people had thought him lost. But Monk, with his austere look and icy demeanour, appeared to ask of his eager lieutenants and delighted soldiers the cause of all this joy. Therefore, to the lieutenants who had come to meet him, and who expressed the uneasiness with which they had learnt his departure,—

‘Why is all this?’ said he; ‘am I obliged to give you an account of myself?’

‘But your honour, the sheep may well tremble without the shepherd!’

‘Tremble!’ replied Monk, in his calm and powerful voice; ‘ah, monsieur, what a word! Curse me, if my sheep have not both teeth and claws; I renounce being their shepherd. Ah, you tremble, gentlemen, do you?’

‘Yes, general, for you.’

‘Oh! pray meddle with your own concerns. If I have not the wit God gave to Oliver Cromwell, I have that which He has sent to me: I am satisfied with it, however little it may be.’

'Monsieur,' said he to D'Artagnan, 'you were perfectly right. Have the kindness to allow me a moment's conversation with M. le Comte de la Fère?'

D'Artagnan took advantage of this to go and ask Grimaud how he was. Monk requested Athos to conduct him to the chamber he lived in.

This chamber was still full of smoke and rubbish. More than fifty balls had passed through the windows and mutilated the walls. They found a table, inkstand, and materials for writing. Monk took up a pen, wrote a single line, signed it, folded the paper, sealed the letter with the seal of his ring, and handed over the missive to Athos, saying, 'Monsieur, carry, if you please, this letter to King Charles II, and set out immediately, if nothing detains you here any longer.'

'And the casks?' said Athos.

'The fisherman who brought me hither will assist you in transporting them on board. Depart, if possible, within an hour.'

'Yes, general,' said Athos.

'Monsieur D'Artagnan!' cried Monk, from the window. D'Artagnan ran up precipitately.

'Embrace your friend and bid him adieu, sir; he is returning to Holland.'

'To Holland!' cried D'Artagnan; 'and I?'

'You are at liberty to follow him, monsieur; but I request you to remain,' said Monk. 'Will you refuse me?'

'Oh, no, general; I am at your orders.'

D'Artagnan embraced Athos, and only had time to bid him adieu. Monk watched them both. Then he took upon himself the preparations for the departure, the transportation of the casks on board, and the embarking of Athos; then, taking D'Artagnan by the arm, who was quite amazed and agitated, he led him towards Newcastle. Whilst going along, the general leaning on his arm, D'Artagnan could not help murmuring to himself, — 'Come, come, it seems to me that the shares of the firm of Planchet and Company are rising.'

'Well, but you, in some degree, deserved a little burning, my friend.' 'How so? What, for having saved King Charles's million?' 'What million?'

'Ah, that is true! you never knew that, my friend; but you must not be angry, for it was my secret. That word "Remember" which the king pronounced upon the scaffold.'

'And which means "souviens-toi!"'

'Exactly. That was signified. "Remember there is a million buried in the vaults of Newcastle Abbey, and that that million belongs to my son."'

'Ah! very well, I understand. But what I understand likewise, and what is very frightful, is, that every time his majesty Charles II will think of me, he will say to himself: "There is the man who came very near to making me lose my crown. Fortunately I was generous, great, full of presence of mind." That will be said by the young gentleman in a shabby black doublet, who came to the château of Blois, hat in hand, to ask me if I would give him access to the king of France.'

'D'Artagnan! D'Artagnan!' said Athos, laying his hand on the shoulder of the musketeer, 'you are unjust.'

'I have a right to be so.'

'No—for you are ignorant of the future.'

D'Artagnan looked his friend full in the face, and began to laugh. 'In truth, my dear Athos,' said he, 'you have some sayings so superb, that they only belong to you and M. le Cardinal Mazarin.'

Athos frowned slightly.

'I beg your pardon,' continued D'Artagnan, laughing, 'I beg your pardon if I have offended you. The future! Nein! what pretty words are words that promise, and how well they fill the mouth in default of other things! Mordieu! After having met with so many who promised, when shall I find one who will give? But, let that pass!' continued D'Artagnan. 'What are you doing here, my dear Athos? Are you the king's treasurer?'

'How—why the king's treasurer?'

'Well, since the king possess a million, he must want a treasurer. The king of France, although he is not worth a sou, has still a superintendent of finance, M. Fouquet. It is true, that, in exchange, M. Fouquet, they say, has a good number of millions of his own.'

'Oh! our million was spent long ago,' said Athos, laughing in his turn.

'I understand; it was frittered away in satin, precious stones, velvet, and feathers of all sorts and colours. All these princes and princesses stood in great need of tailors and dressmakers. Eh! Athos, do you remember what we fellows spent in equipping ourselves for the campaign of La Rochelle, and to make our appearance on horseback? Two or three thousand livres, by my faith! But a king's robe is the more ample; it would require a million to purchase the stuff. At least, Athos, if you are not treasurer, you are on good footing at court.'

'By the faith of a gentleman, I know nothing about it,' said Athos, simply.

'What! you know nothing about it?'

'No! I have not seen the king since we left Dover.'

'Then he has forgotten you, too! Mordieu! That is shameful!'

'His majesty has had so much business to transact.'

'Oh!' cried D'Arragnan, with one of those intelligent grimaces which he alone knew how to make, 'that is enough to make me recover my love for Monseigneur Giulio Mazarini. What, Athos! the king has not seen you since then?'

'No.'

'And you are not furious?'

'I! why should I be? Do you imagine, my dear D'Arragnan, that it was on the king's account I acted as I have done? I did not know the young man. I defended the father, who represented a principle—sacred in my eyes, and I allowed myself to be drawn towards the son from sympathy for this same principle. Besides, he was a worthy knight, a noble creature, that father; do you remember him?'

'Yes; that is true; he was a brave, an excellent man, who led a sad life, but made a fine end.'

'Well, my dear D'Arragnan, understand this; to that king, to that man of heart, to that friend of my thoughts, if I durst venture to say so, I swore at the last hour to preserve faithfully the secret of a deposit which was to be transmitted to his son, to assist him in his hour of need. This young man came to me; he described his destitution; he was ignorant that he was anything to me save a living memory of his father. I have accomplished towards Charles II what I promised Charles I; that is all! Of what consequence is it to me, then, whether he be grateful or not? It is to

Only, on hearing the voice of D'Arragnan, he uttered an exclamation of surprise. The fire being extinguished, the soldiers presented themselves, Digby at their head.

'General,' said he, 'excuse us; what we have done was for love of your honour, whom we thought lost.'

'You are mad, gentlemen. Lost! Is a man like me to be lost? Am I not permitted to be absent, according to my pleasure, without giving formal notice? Do you, by chance, take me for a citizen from the city? Is a gentleman, my friend, my guest, to be besieged, entrapped, and threatened with death, because he is suspected? What signifies the word, suspected? Curse me if I don't have every one of you shot like dogs, that the brave gentleman has left alive!'

'General,' said Digby, piteously, 'there were twenty-eight of us, and see, there are eight on the ground.'

'I authorize M. le Comte de la Fère to send the twenty to join the eight,' said Monk, stretching out his hand to Athos. 'Let them return to camp. Mr Digby, you will consider yourself under arrest for a month.'

'General—'

'That is to teach you, sir, not to act, another time, without orders.'

'I had those of the lieutenant, general.'

'The lieutenant had no such orders to give you, and he shall be placed under arrest, instead of you, if he has really commanded you to burn this gentleman.'

'He did not command that, general; he commanded us to bring him to the camp; but the count was not willing to follow us.'

'I was not willing that they should enter and plunder my house,' said Athos to Monk, with a significant look.

'And you were quite right. To the camp, I say.' The soldiers departed with dejected looks. 'Now we are alone,' said Monk to Athos, 'have the goodness to tell me, monsieur, why you persisted in remaining here, whilst you had your felucca—'

'I waited for you, general,' said Athos. 'Had not your honour appointed to meet me in a week?'

An eloquent look from D'Arragnan made it clear to Monk that these two men, so brave and so loyal, had not acted in concert for his abduction. He knew already it could not be so.

assassinate people, while you look on and warm your hands at the blaze of the conflagration? Mordieux! you are not a man.'

'Patience, sir, patience!' said Monk, smiling.

'Patience! yes, until that brave gentleman is roasted—is that what you mean?' And D'Artagnan rushed forward.

'Remain where you are, sir,' said Monk, in a tone of command. And he advanced towards the house, just as an officer had approached it, saying to the besieged: 'The house is burning, you will be roasted within an hour! There is still time—come, tell us what you know of General Monk, and we will spare your life. Reply, or by Saint Patrick—'

The besieged made no answer; he was no doubt reloading his pistol.

'A reinforcement is expected,' continued the officer; 'in a quarter of an hour there will be a hundred men around your house.'

'I reply to you,' said the Frenchman. 'Let your men be sent away; I will come out freely and repair to the camp alone, or else I will be killed here!'

'Mille tonnerres!' shouted D'Artagnan; 'why, that's the voice of Athos! Ah canailles!' and the sword of D'Artagnan flashed from its sheath. Monk stopped him and advanced himself, exclaiming, in a sonorous voice: 'Hola! what is going on here? Digby, whence this fire? why these cries?'

'The general!' cried Digby, letting the point of his sword fall.

'The general!' repeated the soldiers.

'Well, what is there so astonishing in that?' said Monk, in a calm tone.

Then, silence being re-established,—'Now,' said he, 'who lit this fire?'

The soldiers hung their heads.

'What! do I ask a question, and nobody answers me?' said Monk.

'What! do I find a fault, and nobody repairs it? The fire is still burning, I believe.'

Immediately the twenty men rushed forward, seizing pails, buckets, jars, barrels, and extinguishing the fire with as much ardour as they had, an instant before, employed in promoting it. But already, and before all the rest, D'Artagnan had applied a ladder to the house, crying, 'Athos! it is I, D'Artagnan! Do not kill me, my dearest friend!' And in a moment the count was clasped in his arms. In the meantime, Grimaud, preserving his calmness, dismantled the fortification of the ground-floor, and after having opened the door, stood, with his arms folded, quietly on the sill.

myself I have rendered a service, by relieving myself of this responsibility, and not to him.'

'Well, I have always said,' replied D'Artagnan, with a sigh, 'that disinterestedness was the finest thing in the world.'

'Well, and you, my friend,' resumed Athos, 'are you not in the same situation as myself? If I have properly understood your words, you allowed yourself to be affected by the misfortunes of this young man; that, on your part, was much greater than it was upon mine, for I had a duty to fulfil; whilst you were under no obligation to the son of the martyr. You had not, on your part, to pay him the price of that precious drop of blood which he let fall upon my brow, through the floor of the scaffold. That which made you act was heart alone—the noble and good heart which you possess beneath your apparent scepticism and sarcastic irony; you have engaged the fortune of a servitor, and your own, I suspect, my benevolent miser! and your sacrifice is not acknowledged! Of what consequence is it? You wish to repay Planchet his money. I can comprehend that, my friend: for it is not becoming in a gentleman to borrow from his inferior, without returning to him principal and interest. Well, I will sell La Fete if necessary, and if not, some little farm. You shall pay Planchet, and there will be enough, believe me, of corn left in my granaries for us two and Raoul. In this way, my friend, you will be under obligations to nobody but yourself; and, if I know you well, it will not be a small satisfaction to your mind to be able to say, "I have made a king!" Am I right?'

'Athos! Athos!' murmured D'Artagnan, thoughtfully, 'I have told you more than once that the day on which you will preach I shall attend the sermon; the day on which you will tell me there is a hell—Mordieux! I shall be afraid of the gridiron and the pitch-forks. You are better than I, or rather, better than anybody, and I only acknowledge the possession of one quality, and that is, of not being jealous. Except that defect, damme, as the English say, if I have not all the rest.'

'I know no one equal to D'Artagnan,' replied Athos; 'but here we are, having quietly reached the house I inhabit. Will you come in, my friend?'

'Eh! why this is the tavern of the "Corne du Cerf," I think,' said D'Artagnan.

'I confess I chose it on purpose. I like old acquaintances; I like to sit down on that place, whereon I sank, overcome by fatigue, overwhelmed by despair, when you returned on the 31st of January.'

'After having discovered the abode of the masked executioner? Yes, that was a terrible day!'

'Come in, then,' said Athos, interrupting him.

They entered the large apartment, formerly the common one. The tavern, in general, and this room in particular, had undergone great changes; the ancient host of the musketeers, having become tolerably rich for an innkeeper, had closed his shop, and make of this room of which we were speaking, a store-room for colonial provisions. As for the rest of the house, he let it ready furnished to strangers. It was with unspeakable emotion D'Artagnan recognized all the furniture of the chamber of the first story; the wainscoting, the tapestries, and even that geographical chart which Porthos had so fondly studied in his moments of leisure.

'It is eleven years ago,' cried D'Artagnan. 'Mordieu! it appears to me a century!'

'And to me but a day,' said Athos. 'Imagine the joy I experience, my friend, in seeing you there, in pressing your hand, in casting from me sword and dagger, and tasting without mistrust this glass of sherry. And, oh! what still further joy it would be, if our two friends were there, at the two corners of the table, and Raoul, my beloved Raoul, on the threshold, looking at us with his large eyes, at once so brilliant and so soft!'

'Yes, yes,' said D'Artagnan, much affected, 'that is true. I approve particularly of the first part of your thought; it is very pleasant to smile there where we have so legitimately shuddered in thinking that from one moment to another M. Mordaunt might appear upon the landing.'

At this moment the door opened, and D'Artagnan, brave as he was, could not restrain a slight movement of fright. Athos understood him, and, smiling,—

'It is our host,' said he, 'bringing me a letter.'

'Yes, my lord,' said the good man; 'there is a letter for your honour.'

'Thank you,' said Athos, taking the letter without looking at it. 'Tell me, my dear host, if you do not remember this gentleman?'

The old man raised his head, and looked attentively at D'Artagnan.

'No,' said he.

wanted to get into his house under pretence of taking him to the camp; but he, without being frightened by their number, threatened death to the first who should cross the threshold of his door; and as there was one who did venture, the Frenchman stretched him on the earth with a pistol-shot.'

'Ah! he is a Frenchman, is he?' said D'Artagnan, rubbing his hands.

'Good!'

'How good?' replied the fisherman.

'No, I don't mean that.—What then—my tongue slipped.'

'What then, sir?—why, the other men became as enraged as so many lions: they fired more than a hundred shots at the house; but the Frenchman was sheltered by the wall, and every time they tried to enter by the door they met with a shot from his lackey, whose aim is deadly, d'ye see? Every time they threatened the window, they met with a pistol-shot from the master. Look and count—there are seven men down.'

'Ah! my brave countryman,' cried D'Artagnan, 'wait a little, wait a little. I will be with you, and we will settle with this rabble.'

'One instant, sir,' said Monk, 'wait.'

'Long?'

'No; only the time to ask a question.' Then, turning towards the sailor, 'My friend,' asked he, with an emotion which, in spite of all his self-command, he could not conceal, 'whose soldiers are these, pray tell me?'

'Whose should they be but that madman, Monk's?'

'There has been no battle, then?'

'A battle, ah, yes! for what purpose? Lambert's army is melting away like snow in April. All come to Monk, officers and soldiers. In a week Lambert won't have fifty men left.'

The fisherman was interrupted by a fresh discharge directed against the house, and by another pistol-shot which replied to the discharge and struck down the most daring of the aggressors. The rage of soldiers was at its height. The fire still continued to increase, and a crest of flame and smoke whirled and spread over the roof of the house. D'Artagnan could no longer contain himself. 'Mordieu!' said he to Monk, glancing at him sideways: 'you are a general, and allow your men to burn houses and