

Chapter LXVII

How D'Artagnan Became Acquainted with a Poet

BEFORE taking his place at table, D'Artagnan acquired, as was his custom, all the information he could; but it is an axiom of curiosity, that every man who wishes to question well and fruitfully ought in the first place to lay himself open to questions. D'Artagnan sought, then, with his usual skill, a promising questioner in the hostelry of La Roche-Bernard. At the moment, there were in the house, on the first story, two travellers either preparing for supper, or at supper itself. D'Artagnan had seen their nags in the stable, and their equipages in the salle. One travelled with a lackey, undoubtedly a person of consideration;—two Perche mares, sleek, sound beasts, were suitable means of locomotion. The other, a little fellow, a traveller of meagre appearance, wearing a dusty surcoat, dirty linen, and boots more worn by the pavement than the stirrup, had come from Nantes with a cart drawn by a horse so like Furet in colour, that D'Artagnan might have gone a hundred miles without finding a better match. This cart contained divers large packets wrapped in pieces of old stuff.

'That traveller yonder,' said D'Artagnan to himself, 'is the man for my money. He will do, he suits me; I ought to do for him and suit him; M. Agnan, with the gray doublet and the rusty calotte, is not unworthy of supping with the gentleman of the old boots and still older horse.'

This said, D'Artagnan called the host, and desired him to send his teal, tourteau, and cider up to the chamber of the gentleman of modest exterior. He himself climbed, a plate in his hand, the wooden staircase which led to the chamber, and began to knock at the door.

‘Come in!’ said the unknown. D’Artagnan entered, with a slipper on his lips, his plate under his arm, his hat in one hand, his candle in the other.

‘Excuse me, monsieur,’ said he, ‘I am as you are, a traveller; I know no one in the hotel, and I have the bad habit of losing my spirits when I eat alone; so that my repast appears a bad one to me, and does not nourish me. Your face, which I saw just now, when you came down to have some oysters opened,—your face pleased me much. Besides, I have observed you have a horse just like mine, and that the host, no doubt on account of that resemblance, has placed them side by side in the stable, where they appear to agree amazingly well together. I therefore, monsieur, do not see any reason why the masters should be separated when the horses are united. Accordingly, I am come to request the pleasure of being admitted to your table. My name is Agnan, at your service, monsieur, the unworthy steward of a rich seigneur, who wishes to purchase some salt-mines in this country, and sends me to examine his future acquisitions. In truth, monsieur, I should be well pleased if my countenance were as agreeable to you as yours is to me; for, upon my honour, I am quite at your service.’

The stranger, whom D’Artagnan saw for the first time,—for before he had only caught a glimpse of him,—the stranger had black and brilliant eyes, a yellow complexion, a brow a little wrinkled by the weight of fifty years, bonhomie in his features collectively, but some cunning in his look.

‘One would say,’ thought D’Artagnan, ‘that this merry fellow has never exercised more than the upper part of his head, his eyes, and his brain. He must be a man of science: his mouth, nose, and chin signify absolutely nothing.’

‘Monsieur,’ replied the latter, with whose mind and person we have been making so free, ‘you do me much honour; not that I am ever ennuyé, for I have,’ added he, smiling, ‘a company which amuses me always: but, never mind that, I am happy to receive you.’ But when saying this, the man with the worn boots cast an uneasy look at his table, from which the oysters had disappeared, and upon which there was nothing left but a morsel of salt bacon.

not only did not know him, but were unwilling to know him. One face—a single one—floated visibly for them upon the political current. Their ancient dukes no longer ruled them; government was a void—nothing more. In place of the sovereign duke, the seigneurs of parishes reigned without control; and, above these seigneurs, God, who has never been forgotten in Bretagne. Among these suzerains of châteaux and belfries, the most powerful, the richest, the most popular, was M. Fouquet, seigneur of Belle-Isle. Even in the country, even within sight of that mysterious isle, legends and traditions consecrate its wonders. Every one might not penetrate it: the isle, of an extent of six leagues in length, and six in breadth, was a seigniorial property, which the people had for a long time respected, covered as it was with the name of Retz, so redoubtable in the country. Shortly after the erection of this seignory into a marquissate, Belle-Isle passed to M. Fouquet. The celebrity of the isle did not date from yesterday; its name, or rather its qualification, is traced back to the remotest antiquity. The ancients called it Kalonese, from two Greek words, signifying beautiful isle. Thus, at a distance of eighteen hundred years, it had borne, in another idiom, the same name it still bears. There was, then, something in itself in this property of M. Fouquet’s, besides its position of six leagues off the coast of France; a position which makes it a sovereign in its maritime solitude, like a majestic ship which disdains roads, and proudly casts anchor in mid-ocean.

D’Artagnan learnt all this without appearing the least in the world astonished. He also learnt the best way to get intelligence was to go to La Roche-Bernard, a tolerably important city at the mouth of the Vilaine. Perhaps there he could embark; if not, crossing the salt marshes, he would repair to Guérande or Le Croisic, to wait for an opportunity to cross over to Belle-Isle. He had discovered, besides, since his departure from Châteaubriand, that nothing would be impossible for Furet under the impulsion of M. Agnan, and nothing to M. Agnan through the initiative of Furet. He prepared, then, to sup off a real and a torreau, in a hotel of La Roche-Bernard, and ordered to be brought from the cellar, to wash down these two Breton dishes, some cider, which, the moment it touched his lips, he perceived to be more Breton still.

Paris to prevent all suspicion of his being a messenger from Louis XIV, whom D'Artagnan had called his sun, without suspecting that he who was only at present a rather poor star in the heaven of royalty, would, one day, make that star his emblem; the messenger of Louis XIV, we say, quitted his post and purchased a bidet of the meanest appearance,—one of those animals which an officer of the cavalry would never choose, for fear of being disgraced. Excepting the colour, this new acquisition recalled to the mind of D'Artagnan the famous orange-coloured horse, with which, or rather upon which, he had made his first appearance in the world. Truth to say, from the moment he crossed this new steed, it was no longer D'Artagnan who was travelling,—it was a good man clothed in an iron-gray justaucorps, brown haut-de-chausses, holding the medium between a priest and a layman; that which brought him nearest to the churchman was, that D'Artagnan had placed on his head a calotte of threadbare velvet, and over the calotte, a large black hat; no more sword, a stick hung by a cord to his wrist; but to which, he promised himself, as an unexpected auxiliary, to join, upon occasion, a good dagger, ten inches long, concealed under his cloak. The bidet purchased at Châteaubriand completed the metamorphosis; it was called, or rather D'Artagnan called it, Furet (ferret).

'If I have changed Zephyr into Furet,' said D'Artagnan, 'I must make some diminutive or other of my own name. So, instead of D'Artagnan, I will be Agnan, short; that is a concession which I naturally owe to my gray coat, my round hat, and my rusty calotte.'

Monsieur d'Artagnan travelled, then, pretty easily upon Furet, who ambled like a true butter-woman's pad, and who, with his amble, managed cheerfully about twelve leagues a day, upon four spindle-shanks, of which the practised eye of D'Artagnan had appreciated the strength and safety beneath the thick mass of hair which covered them. Jogging along, the traveller took notes, studied the country, which he traversed reserved and silent, ever seeking the most plausible pretext for reaching Belle-Île-en-Mer, and for seeing everything without arousing suspicion. In this manner, he was enabled to convince himself of the importance the event assumed in proportion as he drew near to it. In this remote country, in this ancient duchy of Bretagne, which was not France at that period, and is not so even now, the people knew nothing of the king of France. They

'Monsieur,' D'Artagnan hastened to say, 'the host is bringing me up a pretty piece of roasted poultry and a superb tourteau.' D'Artagnan had read in the look of his companion, however rapidly it disappeared, the fear of an attack by a parasite: he divined justly. At this opening, the features of the man of modest exterior relaxed; and, as if he had watched the moment for his entrance, as D'Artagnan spoke, the host appeared, bearing the announced dishes. The tourteau and the teal were added to the morsel of broiled bacon; D'Artagnan and his guest bowed, sat down opposite to each other, and, like two brothers, shared the bacon and the other dishes.

'Monsieur,' said D'Artagnan, 'you must confess that association is a wonderful thing.'

'How so?' replied the stranger, with his mouth full.

'Well, I will tell you,' replied D'Artagnan.

The stranger gave a short truce to the movement of his jaws, in order to hear the better.

'In the first place,' continued D'Artagnan, 'instead of one candle, which each of us had, we have two.'

'That is true!' said the stranger, struck with the extreme lucidity of the observation.

'Then I see that you eat my tourteau in preference, whilst I, in preference, eat your bacon.'

'That is true again.'

'And then, in addition to being better lighted and eating what we prefer, I place the pleasure of your company.'

'Truly, monsieur, you are very jovial,' said the unknown, cheerfully.

'Yes, monsieur; jovial, as all people are who carry nothing on their minds, or, for that matter, in their heads. Oh! I can see it is quite another sort of thing with you,' continued D'Artagnan; 'I can read in your eyes all sorts of genius.'

'Oh, monsieur!'

'Come, confess one thing.'

'What is that?'

'That you are a learned man.'

'Ma foi! monsieur.'

'Hein?'

'Almost.'

'Come, then!'

'I am an author.'

'There!' cried D'Artagnan, clapping his hands, 'I knew I could not be deceived! It is a miracle!'

'Monsieur—'

'What, shall I have the honour of passing the evening in the society of an author, of a celebrated author, perhaps?'

'Oh!' said the unknown, blushing, 'celebrated, monsieur, celebrated is not the word.'

'Modest!' cried D'Artagnan, transported, 'he is modest!' Then, turning towards the stranger, with a character of blunt bonhomie: 'But tell me at least the name of your works, monsieur; for you will please to observe you have not told me your name, and I have been forced to divine your genius.'

'My name is Jupenet, monsieur,' said the author.

'A fine name! a grand name! upon my honour; and I do not know why—pardon me the mistake, if it be one—but surely I have heard that name somewhere.'

'I have made verses,' said the poet, modestly.

'Ah! that is it, then; I have heard them read.'

'A tragedy.'

'I must have seen it played.'

The poet blushed again, and said: 'I do not think that can be the case, for my verses have never been printed.'

'Well, then, it must have been the tragedy which informed me of your name.'

'You are again mistaken, for MM. the comedians of the Hôtel de Bourgogne, would have nothing to do with it,' said the poet, with a smile, the receipt for which certain sorts of pride alone knew the secret. D'Artagnan bit his lips. 'Thus, then, you see, monsieur,' continued the poet, 'you are in error on my account, and that not being at all known to you, you have never heard tell of me.'

'Ah! that confounds me. That name, Jupenet, appears to me, nevertheless, a fine name, and quite as worthy of being known as those of MM. Cornelle, or Rotrou, or Garnier. I hope, monsieur, you will have days; there has only this little change taken place in my life. And now let us see! let us take the part of the heart, as I just now was speaking of it. But in truth, I only spoke of it from memory.' And the Gascon applied his hand to his breast, as if he were actually seeking the place where his heart was.

'Ah! wretch!' murmured he, smiling with bitterness. 'Ah! poor mortal species! You hoped, for an instant, that you had not a heart, and now you find you have one—bad courtier as thou art,—and even one of the most seditious. You have a heart which speaks to you in favour of M. Fouquet. And what is M. Fouquet, when the king is in question?—A conspirator, a real conspirator, who did not even give himself the trouble to conceal his being a conspirator; therefore, what a weapon would you not have against him, if his good grace, and his intelligence had not made a scabbard for that weapon. An armed revolt!—for, in fact, M. Fouquet has been guilty of an armed revolt. Thus, while the king vaguely suspects M. Fouquet of rebellion, I know it—I could prove that M. Fouquet had caused the shedding of the blood of his majesty's subjects. Now, then, let us see. Knowing all that, and holding my tongue, what further would this heart wish in return for a kind action of M. Fouquet's, for an advance of fifteen thousand livres, for a diamond worth a thousand pistols, for a smile in which there was as much bitterness as kindness?—I save his life.'

'Now, then, I hope,' continued the musketeer, 'that this imbecile of a heart is going to preserve silence, and so be fairly quits with M. Fouquet. Now, then, the king becomes my sun, and as my heart is quits with M. Fouquet, let him beware who places himself between me and my sun! Forward, for his majesty Louis XIV!—Forward!'

These reflections were the only impediments which were able to retard the progress of D'Artagnan. These reflections once made, he increased the speed of his horse. But, however perfect his horse Zephyr might be, it could not hold out at such a pace forever. The day after his departure from Paris, his mount was left at Chartres, at the house of an old friend D'Artagnan had met with in an hôtelier of that city. From that moment the musketeer travelled on post-horses. Thanks to this mode of locomotion, he traversed the space separating Chartres from Châteaubriand. In the last of these two cities, far enough from the coast to prevent any one guessing that D'Artagnan wished to reach the sea—far enough from was brave enough to ask himself sincerely and conscientiously if he were brave. Therefore to this:—

‘But it appears to me that I drew promptly enough, and cut and thrust pretty freely on the Place de Grève, to be satisfied of my bravery,’ D’Artagnan had himself replied. ‘Gently, captain, that is not an answer. I was brave that day, because they were burning my house, and there are a hundred, and even a thousand, to speak against one, that if those gentlemen of the riots had not formed that unlucky idea, their plan of attack would have succeeded, or, at least, it would not have been I who would have opposed myself to it. Now, what will be brought against me? I have no house to be burnt in Bretagne; I have no treasure there that can be taken from me.—No; but I have my skin; that precious skin of M. d’Artragan, which to him is worth more than all the houses and all the treasures of the world. That skin to which I cling above everything, because it is, everything considered, the binding of a body which encloses a heart very warm and ready to fight, and, consequently, to live. Then, I do desire to live: and, in reality, I live much better, more completely, since I have become rich. Who the devil ever said that money spoiled life? Upon my soul, it is no such thing, on the contrary, it seems as if I absorbed a double quantity of air and sun. Mordieux! what will it be then, if I double that fortune; and if, instead of the swich I now hold in my hand, I should ever carry the baton of a maréchal? Then I really don’t know if there will be, from that moment, enough of air and sun for me. In fact, this is not a dream, who the devil would oppose it, if the king made me a maréchal, as his father, King Louis XIII, made a duke and constable of Albert de Luynes? Am I not as brave, and much more intelligent, than that imbecile De Vitry? Ah! that’s exactly what will prevent my advancement: I have too much wit. Luckily, if there is any justice in this world, fortune owes me many compensations. She owes me certainly a recompense for all I did for Anne of Austria, and an indemnification for all she has not done for me. Then, at the present, I am very well with a king, and with a king who has the appearance of determining to reign. May God keep him in that illustrious road! For, if he is resolved to reign, he will want me; and if he wants me, he will give me what he has promised me—warmth and light; so that I march, comparatively, now, as I marched formerly,—from nothing to everything. Only the nothing of to-day is the all of former the goodness to repeat to me a part of your tragedy presently, by way of dessert, for instance. That will be sugared roast meat,—mordieux! Ah! pardon me, monsieur, that was a little oath which escaped me, because it is a habit with my lord and master. I sometimes allow myself to usurp that little oath, as it seems in pretty good taste. I take this liberty only in his absence, please to observe, for you may understand that in his presence—but, in truth, monsieur, this cider is abominable; do you not think so? And besides, the pot is of such an irregular shape it will not stand on the table.’

‘Suppose we were to make it level?’

‘To be sure; but with what?’

‘With this knife.’

‘And the teal, with what shall we cut that up? Do you not, by chance, mean to touch the teal?’

‘Certainly.’

‘Well, then—’

‘Wait.’

And the poet rummaged in his pocket, and drew out a piece of brass, oblong, quadrangular, about a line in thickness, and an inch and a half in length. But scarcely had this little piece of brass seen the light, than the poet appeared to have committed an imprudence, and made a movement to put it back again in his pocket. D’Artragan perceived this, for he was a man that nothing escaped. He stretched forth his hand towards the piece of brass: ‘Humph! that which you hold in your hand is pretty; will you allow me to look at it?’

‘Certainly,’ said the poet, who appeared to have yielded too soon to a first impulse. ‘Certainly, you may look at it: but it will be in vain for you to look at it,’ added he, with a satisfied air; ‘if I were not to tell you its use, you would never guess it.’

D’Artragan had seized as an avowal the hesitation of the poet, and his eagerness to conceal the piece of brass which a first movement had induced him to take out of his pocket. His attention, therefore, once awakened on this point, he surrounded himself with a circumspection which gave him a superiority on all occasions. Besides, whatever M. Jupenet might say about it, by a simple inspection of the object, he perfectly well knew what it was. It was a character in printing.

'Can you guess, now, what this is?' continued the poet.

'No,' said D'Artagnan, 'no, ma foi!'

'Well, monsieur,' said M. Jupenet, 'this little piece of metal is a printing letter.'

'Bah!'

'A capital.'

'Stop, stop, stop,' said D'Artagnan, opening his eyes very innocently.

'Yes, monsieur, a capital; the first letter of my name.'

'And this is a letter, is it?'

'Yes, monsieur.'

'Well, I will confess one thing to you.'

'And what is that?'

'No, I will not, I was going to say something stupid.'

'No, no,' said Master Jupenet, with a patronizing air.

'Well, then, I cannot comprehend, if that is a letter, how you can make a word.'

'A word?'

'Yes, a printed word.'

'Oh, that's very easy.'

'Let me see.'

'Does it interest you?'

'Enormously.'

'Well, I will explain the thing to you. Attend.'

'I am attending.'

'This is it.'

'Good.'

'Look attentively.'

'I am looking.' D'Artagnan, in fact, appeared absorbed in observations.

Jupenet drew from his pocket seven or eight other pieces of brass smaller than the first.

'Ah, ah,' said D'Artagnan.

'What?'

'You have, then, a whole printing-office in your pocket. Peste! that is curious, indeed.'

'Is it not?'

'Good God, what a number of things we learn by travelling.'

Chapter LXVI

The Journey

I was perhaps the fiftieth time since the day on which we open this history, that this man, with a heart of bronze and muscles of steel, had left house and friends, everything, in short, to go in search of fortune and death. The one—that is to say, death—had constantly retreated before him, as if afraid of him; the other—that is to say, fortune—for only a month past had really made an alliance with him. Although he was not a great philosopher, after the fashion of either Epicurus or Socrates, he was a powerful spirit, having knowledge of life, and endowed with thought. No one is as brave, as adventurous, or as skilful as D'Artagnan, without at the same time being inclined to be a dreamer. He had picked up, here and there, some scraps of M. de la Rochefoucault, worthy of being translated into Latin by MM. de Port Royal; and he had made a collection, en passant, in the society of Athos and Aramis, of many morsels of Seneca and Cicero, translated by them, and applied to the uses of common life. That contempt of riches which our Gascon had observed as an article of faith during the thirty-five first years of his life, had for a long time been considered by him as the first article of the code of bravery. 'Article first,' said he, 'A man is brave because he has nothing. A man has nothing because he despises riches.' Therefore, with these principles, which, as we have said, had regulated the thirty-five first years of his life, D'Artagnan was no sooner possessed of riches, than he felt it necessary to ask himself if, in spite of his riches, he were still brave. To this, for any other but D'Artagnan, the events of the Place de Grève might have served as a reply. Many consciences would have been satisfied with them, but D'Artagnan find myself, therefore, in the same position in which M. Turenne found himself when opposed to the Prince de Condé at Jargeau, Gien and the Faubourg Saint-Antoine. He did not execrate monsieur le prince, it is true, but he obeyed the king. Monsieur le prince is an agreeable man, but the king is king. Turenne heaved a deep sigh, called Condé “My cousin,” and swept away his army. Now what does the king wish? That does not concern me. Now, what does M. Colbert wish? Oh, that’s another thing. M. Colbert wishes all that M. Fouquet does not wish. Then what does M. Fouquet wish? Oh, that is serious. M. Fouquet wishes precisely for all the king wishes.’

This monologue ended, D’Artagnan began to laugh, whilst making his whip whistle in the air. He was already on the high road, frightening the birds in the hedges, listening to the livres chinking and dancing in his leather pocket, at every step; and, let us confess it, every time that D’Artagnan found himself in such conditions, tenderness was not his dominant vice. ‘Come,’ said he, ‘I cannot think the expedition a very dangerous one; and it will fall out with my voyage as with that piece M. Monk took me to see in London, which was called, I think, Much Ado about Nothing.’

‘To your health!’ said Jupenet, quite enchanted.

‘To yours, mordoux, to yours. But—an instant—not in this cider. It is an abominable drink, unworthy of a man who quenches his thirst at the Hippocrène fountain—is not it so you call your fountain, you poets?’

‘Yes, monsieur, our fountain is so called. That comes from two Greek words—hippos, which means a horse, and—’

‘Monsieur,’ interrupted D’Artagnan, ‘you shall drink of a liquor which comes from one single French word, and is none the worse for that—from the word grape; this cider gives me the heartburn. Allow me to inquire of your host if there is not a good bottle of Beaugency, or of the Cétan growth, at the back of the large bins in his cellar.’

The host, being sent for, immediately attended.

‘Monsieur,’ interrupted the poet, ‘take care, we shall not have time to drink the wine, unless we make great haste, for I must take advantage of the tide to secure the boat.’

‘What boat?’ asked D’Artagnan.

‘Why the boat which sets out for Belle-Isle.’

‘Ah—for Belle-Isle?’ said the musketeer, ‘that is good.’

‘Bah! you will have plenty of time, monsieur,’ replied the hôtelier, uncorking the bottle, ‘the boat will not leave this hour.’

‘But who will give me notice?’ said the poet.

‘Your fellow-traveller,’ replied the host.

‘But I scarcely know him.’

‘When you hear him departing, it will be time for you to go.’

‘Is he going to Belle-Isle, likewise, then?’

‘Yes.’

‘The traveller who has a lackey?’ asked D’Artagnan. ‘He is some gentleman, no doubt?’

‘I know nothing of him.’

‘What!—know nothing of him?’

‘No, all I know is, that he is drinking the same wine as you.’

‘Peste!—that is a great honour for us,’ said D’Artagnan, filling his companion’s glass, whilst the host went out.

‘So,’ resumed the poet, returning to his dominant ideas, ‘you never saw any printing done?’

‘Never.’

'Well, then, take the letters thus, which compose the word, you see: A B; ma foi! here is an R, two E, then a G.' And he assembled the letters with a swiftness and skill which did not escape the eye of D'Artagnan.

'Abrégé,' said he, as he ended.

'Good!' said D'Artagnan; 'there are plenty of letters got together; but how are they kept so?' And he poured out a second glass for the poet. M. Jupenet smiled like a man who has an answer for everything; then he pulled out—still from his pocket—a little metal ruler, composed of two parts, like a carpenter's rule, against which he put together, and in a line, the characters, holding them under his left thumb.

'And what do you call that little metal ruler?' said D'Artagnan, 'for, I suppose, all these things have names.'

'This is called a composing-stick,' said Jupenet; 'it is by the aid of this stick that the lines are formed.'

'Come, then, I was not mistaken in what I said; you have a press in your pocket,' said D'Artagnan, laughing with an air of simplicity so stupid, that the poet was completely his dupe.

'No,' replied he; 'but I am too lazy to write, and when I have a verse in my head, I print it immediately. That is a labour spared.'

'Mordieu!' thought D'Artagnan to himself, 'this must be cleared up.' And under a pretext, which did not embarrass the musketeer, who was fertile in expedients, he left the table, went downstairs, ran to the shed under which stood the poet's little cart, and poked the point of his poniard into the stuff which enveloped one of the packages, which he found full of types, like those which the poet had in his pocket.

'Humph!' said D'Artagnan, 'I do not yet know whether M. Fouquet wishes to fortify Belle-Isle; but, at all events, here are some spiritual munitions for the castle.' Then, enchanted with his rich discovery, he ran upstairs again, and resumed his place at the table.

D'Artagnan had learnt what he wished to know. He, however, remained, none the less, face to face with his partner, to the moment when they heard from the next room symptoms of a person's being about to go out. The printer was immediately on foot; he had given orders for his horse to be got ready. His carriage was waiting at the door. The second traveller got into his saddle, in the courtyard, with his lackey. D'Artagnan followed Jupenet to the door; he embarked his cart and horse on board his eyes five minutes after he had blown out his lamp. Many events might, however, have kept him awake. Thought boiled in his brain, conjectures abounded, and D'Artagnan was a great drawer of horoscopes; but, with that imperturbable phlegm which does more than genius for the fortune and happiness of men of action, he put off reflection till the next day, for fear, he said, not to be fresh when he wanted to be so.

The day came. The Rue des Lombards had its share of the caresses of Aurora with the rosy fingers, and D'Artagnan arose like Aurora. He did not awaken anybody; he placed his portmanteau under his arm, descended the straits without making one of them creak, and without disturbing one of the sonorous snorings in every story from the garret to the cellar, then, having saddled his horse, shut the stable and house doors, he set off, at a foot-pace, on his expedition to Bretagne. He had done quite right not to trouble himself with all the political and diplomatic affairs which solicited his attention; for, in the morning, in freshness and mild twilight, his ideas developed themselves in purity and abundance. In the first place, he passed before the house of Fouquet, and threw in a large gaping box the fortunate order which, the evening before, he had had so much trouble to recover from the hooked fingers of the intendant. Placed in an envelope, and addressed to Fouquet, it had not even been divined by Planchet, who in divination was equal to Calchas or the Pythian Apollo. D'Artagnan thus sent back the order to Fouquet, without compromising himself, and without having thenceforward any reproaches to make himself. When he had effected this proper restitution, 'Now,' he said to himself, 'let us inhale much maternal air, much freedom from cares, much health, let us allow the horse Zephyr, whose flanks puff as if he had to respire an atmosphere, to breathe, and let us be very ingenious in our little calculations. It is time,' said D'Artagnan, 'to form a plan of the campaign, and, according to the method of M. Turenne, who has a large head full of all sorts of good counsels, before the plan of the campaign it is advisable to draw a striking portrait of the generals to whom we are opposed. In the first place, M. Fouquet presents himself. What is M. Fouquet? M. Fouquet,' replied D'Artagnan to himself, 'is a handsome man, very much beloved by the women, a generous man very much beloved by the poets; a man of wit, much execrated by pretenders. Well, now I am neither woman, poet, nor pretender: I neither love nor hate monsieur le surintendant. I